The wall in the northern Czech town of Usti nad Labem separates some 37 mostly Gypsy families living in two apartment buildings from inhabitants of three houses across the street who have complained about the noise from their ethnic minority neighbors.

"It is a clear signal of social separation," Guenter Verheugen, the EU commissioner in charge of expansion of the union, told reporters Thursday in Prague. "It cannot be tolerated."

The decision of municipal authorities to build the wall last month has drawn strong criticism at home and abroad. The wall replaced a fence that was built last year.

The government is negotiating with municipal authorities in Usti nad Labem, 55 miles north of Prague. A final decision is expected this month.

Although Verheugen said he was confident this particular problem can be solved soon, he said the issue of the Gypsies — also called Roma — must be addressed in a much broader context. The EU will support, both financially and politically, social programs aimed at improving the situation of the Roma minority in the Czech Republic, he said.

Verheugen also said the Czech Republic has a good chance of joining the EU in the first wave of expansion.

"I believe that the Czech Republic will realize its potential and be among the applicants who will be first to join," he said.

Committee formed to influence library

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new committee established by Student Senate will ensure the presence of a student voice in how money is spent and what services are offered at Hale Library.

Gabe Eckert, student body vice president, said the KSU Libraries Student Advisory Committee will serve in the long term as a direction for establishing additional student services in the library. He said it also will evaluate the services and programs offered now and make recommendations in an annual report to Senate about changes that can be made.

"We want to evaluate the current services offered and then make recommendations to better serve the students," Eckert said. "The committee will also see where the library is now and how it can be made more user-friendly."

Eckert said the committee will be a combination of student senators, at-large, cabinet and faculty members. However, only students on the committee will be able to vote. He said the faculty members will serve in an advisory capacity only.

"The library is the center of academic life on campus," Eckert said. "It is important for students to have an input on how the library should best serve them."

Eckert said appointments for the committee have not yet been made, but that the committee will be in place by the end of the semester.

"We want to have a guarantee the money is going to its assigned place."

— Jason Heinrich, student body president

Jason Heinrich, student body president, said the committee also was created to make sure the $1-per-credit-hour increase, proposed by Senate last year, goes toward its assigned place.

"This committee will ensure that the students' money is going toward the library," Heinrich said. "We want to have a guarantee the money is going to its assigned place."

The tuition increase was passed unanimously by Senate last spring and also has been approved by University President Jon Wefald and the Kansas Board of Regents. The proposal is waiting final approval by the Kansas Legislature, which will reconvene in January.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said he wanted to have a student committee even when the proposed increase was a part of the privilege fee. He said he felt it was important to have students' input on where to put the money and how to improve library services.

"I see the committee as a very valuable tool to tell us what the students want before we begin spending money," Hobrock said. "The students should be consulted first because it is their money that is going to the library. We want to find out how to best use that."

Eckert said he sees the committee as a group not only giving input on how to spend funds but also as a voice for the rest of campus.

"We want this to be a permanent mechanism on how to best use student money to support the library," Eckert said. "We felt it was important for students to have the opportunity to provide direction for the library."

Hobrock said one of the issues about which students have submitted requests is extending the library's hours during the school year and finals week.

He said at this time, it is a question of staffing and how many students actually would be using the library through the late hours. He said the committee, once established, will be tackling this issue, among others that affect students.

"This is the kind of thing the committee will be doing, seeing what the students want and then reporting it to others," Hobrock said. "The library needs to understand what the students need and want.

"Its not just about books and databases, but what kind of services students need to become successful."

Resourceful Improvements

Students' requests for Hale Library improvements

- 24-hour access to first through fourth floors
- Network of computer terminals near 24-hour study area that can be accessed 24 hours a day
- More computers on third and fourth floors
- More copy machines in more convenient locations on each floor
- More books and journals
- Comments and requests for library improvement can be submitted to Hale's reception desk on the second floor.
- KSU Libraries Student Advisory Committee will consider the requests next semester as it evaluates the library's needs.

K-State-Salina course permits students to experience hypoxia

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The cause of death of pro-golfer Payne Stewart still is in question, but investigators believe lack of oxygen, or hypoxia, was the cause of his LearJet crashing in South Dakota on Oct. 25.

Human Factors, a course offered at K-State-Salina, allows students to learn not only why problems occur and how to fix them, but it also gives students the chance to experience the effects of hypoxia so they might be able to help themselves and others on a plane to keep another tragedy from occurring.

"Through this class, students have the opportunity to train in a simulated environment and observe what goes on when they are deprived of oxygen," Ken Barnard, professor of aviation, said. "It shows them what happens when they get it that situation."

Barnard said the air people breathe is 21 percent oxygen, 78 percent nitrogen and the rest is made up of various other elements. As the oxygen enters the lungs, it is transposed by hemoglobin and transported to the various organs as well as the brain for proper functioning. However, as the altitude increases, air pressure decreases and less oxygen reaches the organs because the pressure does not allow the oxygen to travel through the system.

He said the effect is the same as that often experienced by mountain climbers who climb the steeps of the world's highest mountains. However, unlike pilots, mountain climbers have the benefit of being able to adjust over several days to the change in pressure.

Effects of hypoxia can include tingling throughout the body, hot flashes and fingernails becoming blue because oxygen is not reaching the extremities. Those overcome with hypoxia also can succumb to a feeling of euphoria. He said the victim eventually can pass out or die from the lack of oxygen.

"This gives potential pilots an added safety factor as they are training," Barnard said. "They begin to notice how their functions are in a deprived mode, and by being made aware of how they react in the danger zone, they learn how to help themselves in a dangerous situation."

Barnard said he takes the students in his class on an annual trip to the Federal Aviation Administration's Civil Aeromedical Institute in Oklahoma City. Here, a chamber allows students to experience hypoxia by being placed in a vacuum where air is pumped out to simulate flying at high altitudes.

Nathen Kuhlmann, junior in the professional pilot program, said the experience of the chamber was good because the class had the opportunity to study the effects of hypoxia in a controlled environment.

"We had the experience of learning the effects of hypoxia and how to react to our bodies when in that situation," Kuhlmann said. "Now we have an idea of how to correct our actions when faced with hypoxia."

Barnard said enough air is removed from the chamber after a while to simulate 25,000 feet. Then, through a rapid decompression, oxygen masks are put on and students remain in a simulated 18,000 feet environment for 10 to 15 minutes. This is the point where they can begin observing the effects of hypoxia on themselves and their classmates.

"This makes the point vivid by them experiencing it first hand," Barnard said. "Every individual experiences it differently, so the idea is to know how to react when it does hit."

Scott Macek, senior in the professional pilot program, said it was weird knowing what was going to happen, but not knowing how it would affect each individual.

"The training allows us to experience the symptoms first hand," Macek said. "However, we don't know how it is going to affect each individual."

Barnard said in the case of Stewart's plane, which was flying at 30,000 feet, it only took five to seven seconds for hypoxia to set in. He said, however, the lower the plane is flying, the more regulated the air pressure is and the better people can breathe.

"Because they have the opportunity to know how the body functions with lack of oxygen, they have the ability to save themselves and others," Barnard said. "If they know they are experiencing hypoxia, they can lower the plane or put their oxygen masks on to maintain their functioning ability."

The effect of hypoxia is the same as that often experienced by mountain climbers who climb the steeps of the world's highest mountains. However, unlike pilots, mountain climbers have the benefit of being able to adjust over several days to the change in pressure.

Dagny Lowery, senior in the professional pilot program, said an important part of the training was to learn how to respond immediately when being affected with hypoxia. She also said since hypoxia can happen even at low altitudes, it was important to learn when hypoxia was happening.

"We have to know instantly when to put our oxygen masks on and be able to breathe," Lowery said. "Sometimes hypoxia can happen when you are flying long distances, so the No. 1 thing to learn is the symptoms an individual is faced with. The primary symptom that each of us are afflicted with will probably be the warning sign every time."

Barnard said the point of his class is to look at why errors occur and look at the training, cockpit design and communication among the crew members in order to correct these mistakes.

While in Oklahoma, the class also had the opportunity to participate in a school survival course and survival training. All of the training exercises were meant to supplement what the students are learning in class.

Exercises included being placed in a minus-20-degree environment and then having to start a fire.

They also had to jump into water and as a group had to climb into a raft and practice getting into a Coast Guard rescue basket.

Kuhlmann said all of the training received through the experiences in Oklahoma were beneficial.

"We can read all we want in textbooks, but we can't know what these situations are like until we experience them first hand," Kuhlmann said. "We now have a better understanding of survival skills that we wouldn't have gotten with just reading textbooks."

Plan for specialty seats step in wrong direction

One key to winning an election is running for a position, and Black Student Union recognizes that not enough minorities run for office at K-State.

Student Governing Association members don't reflect K-State's diversity. BSU is taking steps to remedy that by encouraging more minorities to run for Student Senate next year.

We should stand up and cheer BSU's efforts.

However, if that plan fails and more minorities aren't elected next term, BSU has devised an alternate plan. Plan B includes asking SGA to appoint six minority students in the following term.

Everyone benefits when Senate is representative of the entire student body, because every student has a voice. Plan B is questionable, however, because appointments should be the last option.

BSU deserves high praise for trying to gain seats the old-fashioned way — through popular election. If that fails, BSU should look at other options. Those options might include Plan B, but only after voter trends have been examined.

If having more minorities run doesn't increase minority representation, those reasons should be examined. Maybe more weren't elected because only certain students vote, in which case, a Plan C might be to get more students to the polls.

In short, encouraging more minority students to run for office is a wonderful idea. If that doesn't work, other options should be considered before Plan B is put into action.

filling the void

Quest for enlightenment, explanation of life's meanings evokes animosity toward fast-paced humanist culture

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

SCOTT RONEY

"The truth is out there."

This famous line from "The X-Files" seems to have grabbed hold of the nation's consciousness. Or at least, it did for a while, before we once again lost interest in the pursuit of truth and went back to pursuing things more mundane, more material and generally less satisfying.

So we buy more, eat more, drink more, party more, achieve more and do more, but the questions remain.

"Why am I here? What is the truth? Upon what will I base my life and my view of the world? Where did I come from and why?"

I recall one of the most vivid scenes from Frank Peretti's novel, "The Prophet." The main character, a news anchor, is in a shopping mall when he has a vision of the entire mall and its inhabitants being sucked into a giant black hole at one end. The shoppers and salespeople seem to be intentionally ignoring this vacuum that is sucking up everything, but as it gets closer and closer they start buying more and more, faster and faster, talking louder and louder, as if this would somehow fill the void they are about to become a part of. What a telling description of our culture today.

Most of us at K-State either are pursuing our goals in life or trying to figure out what they might be. We must be careful not to be like the proverbial man who climbs, day after day, striving for the top, only to get there and realize that he scaled the wrong mountain.

Sure, money's great, but will it bring fulfillment? All that rich and famous people seem to want is more money and more fame; it's never enough. If success is the answer, why do so many successful people seek happiness in drugs? Why are there so many people who seem to have it all, yet are miserable?

Having a family can help to provide meaning, but it also brings with it tremendous responsibility and associated headaches. Friendships are vital, but friends will let us down from time to time.

Still those nagging questions persist in the back of the mind.

We see the symptoms in our society as a whole, also. Morality seems as forgotten as the days before the automobile. Families fall apart, social pathologies rise, and people now kill each other out of everyday frustration or just for kicks.

During the 17th through 19th centuries, the dominant philosophy was modernism, which claimed man could discover absolute truth and the answer to all the fundamental questions of life through reason and the use of the mind. God and his revelation were no longer necessary. We could figure out the world just fine on our own, perhaps even come up with something better than all those constraining myths. But the problem was, it didn't work.

As J. Budziszewski, professor of philosophy and government at the University of Texas-Austin, said: "If it was working, they should have agreed with each other more and more. Instead they agreed with each other less and less. About everything. About what man is, what life means, how to live it, the works."

So now we have postmodernism, which denies that absolute truth even exists. It claims that one view is as right as another and reality and history are merely whatever we interpret them to be. In essence, two plus two equals, well, whatever you want it to. It might equal something different for someone else.

Postmodernism is just a cop-out. Not wanting to accept revealed truth, and not succeeding in discovering it on their own, people simply brush the question aside by saying, "There is no such thing as truth, no absolute right or wrong, no ultimate purpose."

Something inside us tells us that this is not the case. Why else would we even ask the question "What is truth?" What would cause us to seek after it if it did not exist? We know, deep down inside, that some things must be right — always — and some things are always wrong. We know there has to be a purpose because whenever someone creates something, such as the world or human beings, there is some motivation or reason.

So we know that absolute truth exists, but we can't seem to find it on our own. How then can we find the answers?

In one of his monthly columns for Boundless Webzine, www.boundless.org, Budziszewski relates a fictional conversation with a student who summed it up well: "Before the Enlightenment the intellectuals based their thinking on the Bible. You know — God made man, man rebelled and messed himself up, God responded by calling Israel to be his people and later coming in person as Jesus — all that."

The answers to the ultimate questions we ask can only be answered by the creator and source of life itself. That is, truth can be known, absolutely, through God's revelation to us.

The more I read the Bible, the more I come to the conclusion mankind alone would never write this kind of stuff. Why would we write a book telling us that what we love to do is wrong and that apart from God we are hopelessly lost? How could we get 40 authors, from all backgrounds and walks of life and writing over a span of at least 1,500 years, to agree on all the fundamental questions of life and numerous other controversial topics? How could more than 300 prophecies, made over a span of 900 years, perfectly describe the life of one man who was born 400 years after the last prediction?

Yes, Virginia, there is absolute truth. Many people have found it, and their lives have never been the same since. There is a God, who has revealed himself. Not just through a book, but in the person of Jesus Christ. In an intimate and vibrant personal relationship with him, we find the answer to our seeking, the solution to our longing and the meaning, purpose and love that we all want but so few seem to find.

In one of my favorite movies, "The Matrix," there is a line that grabs my attention every time. "It's the question, Neo. The question that drives us. You know the question, just as I once did. ... The truth is out there, Neo, and it's looking for you."

But are you looking for him?

Run-ins with law inevitably lead to public embarrasment

APRYL MATHES

"The two most abundant things in the universe are hydrogen and stupidity."
— Harlan Ellison

There's something I like about the newsroom on Sunday nights. Maybe it's the hustle and bustle of reporters scurrying about, or the excitement of being in such a fast-paced environment, or it could be the opportunity to be surrounded by so many talented journalists.

Nah.

Even if all that were true, even in some watered-down form, it can't compare to taking calls from students who have been arrested over the weekend and are trying to lobby to have their names excused, if you will, from publication.

We've heard it all.

"I've got this job interview/student body president campaign/kidney transplant and blah, blah, blah."

You get the idea.

I actually used to compile the cop reports, and I recall one day when, as I was perusing the records I came across my ex-boyfriend, who had gotten picked up for DUI. When we were together, I tried to tell him he drank too much and he was heading down a road wrought with peril, but he never listened to me. Not that I enjoyed putting his name in the paper, of course. I only laughed a little bit.

All right, I laughed my ass off.

My run-in with the law happened when I was young and foolish; in fact, I like to refer to my first year at school as my freshman follies.

My roommate and I had this great idea to load up my car with beer and then drive to Aggieville. Our plan was to sit in my car and knock back a few cold ones and then hit the boxing ring at KJ's Bar and Dance Club. Don't ask me what I was thinking. I have become convinced that reason and logic played no role in my decisions as a freshman. As we sat in front of Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, sipping on some Keystone Light, a cop walked by. Naturally, I freaked out and got out of the car and started to run.

You can only run so far and so fast in 3-inch platforms before you get tackled by a man in a blue uniform who outweighs you by about 150 pounds. After showing him my fake ID (note to self: after being accosted by an officer of the law, do not attempt to fool him with a license of someone who is a foot taller and of a different race.), I ended up in the cop shop.

I finally decided to call my dad, who seemed puzzled at my predicament.

"Isn't it legal to drink beer when you're 18?" he asked.

Not according to Officer Fink, Pops.

My little brother still likes to bring up this story, usually during Thanksgiving dinners or other family gatherings. He always asks me to reenact the incident and is under the mistaken impression that there was some sort of body-cavity search involved.

The moral of the story — besides the fact that underage individuals should not park directly in front of a bar, drinking cheap beer under the glow of the neon lights of Aggieville — is that you can't avoid having your name printed in the paper when you screw up.

Unless you're cool like me and get busted during finals week, when the Collegian calls it quits for the semester.

McCulloh move not in violation of 1st Amendment, reader says

Editor,

Isn't Karen McCulloh "upholding" the First Amendment, rather than "violating" it, which the recall petition argues? The issue seems to be a violation to the First Amendment. By voting to remove the monolith from the front of Manhattan City Hall, McCulloh has not violated any part of the Constitution. The petition says that she has "intentionally denied the civil rights of the undersigned to the full and equal use and enjoyment of the city services ... all done under color of local office to further secular humanism as the established policy of the city of Manhattan in violation of the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution."

McCulloh simply was obeying her role as city commissioner by voting her conscience. There was no misconduct on her part. This recall election is a serious misuse of the process that is intended to be based on the grounds of misconduct, boundary change, participating in certain prohibited contracts or violating the Open Meetings Act. None of these issues applies to McCulloh.

According to the First Amendment to the Constitution, "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. ..." McCulloh is upholding our Constitution, which is quite clear in proclaiming separation of church and state. By voting to move the monolith, it does not mean McCulloh is against the Ten Commandments. Her vote only indicated it is inappropriate to have a Christian symbol on the lawn of the City Hall. The monolith has a fine new home at Manhattan Christian College, which is a more appropriate spot.

Dec. 7 is the day to vote "no" and retain McCulloh in office. Do what is best for the community by showing your support for the First Amendment to the Constitution.

Workshop helps students learn table manners

BY JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The combination of stress and worry can overpower all rational thought in a dinner-interview situation.

But for K-State students who attended the Dining and Etiquette Workshop on Thursday, surviving a dinner interview calmly is now a possibility.

Pat Pesci, instructor of hotel and restaurant management, facilitated the workshop, which was sponsored by Career and Employment Services and Greek Affairs. The purpose of workshop was to teach students how to act in a dinner situation with a prospective employer.

"If even little things are not right, it can be the kiss of death in a dinner-interview situation," Pesci said.

The workshop involved a formal dinner, which Pesci guided the participants through step by step.

"At the beginning of the meal you look to your host and follow him," Pesci said. "Let your host take the first bite."

Pesci went over some basic rules of thumb, such as passing the salt and pepper together and passing everything to your right, but he also addressed many rules that are not as widely recognized.

"When you drop something on the floor, you should just leave it," Pesci said. "Unless it is something like a fork, then you should ask the wait staff for a clean one."

The participants in the workshop said they thought the material covered was helpful and beneficial.

"I never would have known half of the things that he talked about," Randi Velez, senior in industrial engineering, said. "I came because I thought it would be helpful when I look for a job, and I found out many helpful things."

Pesci said all the aspects of the workshop are vitally important because employers observe all mannerisms and habits.

"One of the things that can be the kiss of death is ordering more than one alcoholic beverage or lighting up a cigarette," Pesci said.

Cynthia Dowdy, graduate student in student counseling and personal services and Career and Employment Services coordinator for the workshop, said the workshop is offered in both the fall and spring semesters.

"The workshop happens twice a year, and we have done it since the spring of 1998," Dowdy said.

Pesci said the main thing he hopes students learn from the workshop is that all the small things are important.

"Everything adds up," Pesci said. "One thing that I am glad about is that everyone at the workshop wanted to be there, and they can take what they learned and apply it to their lives immediately."

For students who attended the workshop, it proved to be a worthwhile event.

"I don't think that I would have come if it was not a class requirement for me," said Jennifer Hofstetter, sophomore in apparel marketing and design. "But I am real' -lad that I did."

Dining etiquette hints

K-State's "Mr. Manners," Pat Pesci, led the fall dining etiquette workshop in Derby Dining Center to teach the faux pas of dining etiquette and to prepare students for dinner interviews.

Helpful hints:

- Pass food to your right.
- Keep the salt and pepper together when you pass them.
- Do not add any condiments to your food before you taste it.
- Do not add condiments to meat.
- Do not talk with food in your mouth.
- Do not put elbows or hands on the table.
- If you drop something in the walkway, ask the staff to remove it.
- It is the host or hostess's duty to pay for the meal. Do not offer to pay.

Tournament to celebrate disc golf course opening

BY JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan's new disc golf course will be introduced this weekend during its first first tournament Sunday.

"This is our chance to let everyone in Manhattan and Kansas see what we've been working on," said Andy Klaasmeyer, junior in computer science and Manhattan Disc Golf Club president.

"This is our last chance to let everyone in Manhattan and Kansas see what we've been working on"

— Andy Klaasmeyer, junior in computer science and Manhattan Disc Golf Club president

The golf course, located in the River Pond Area of Tuttle Creek State Park, has just been finished this week, although some touches will be made after the tournament is over, Klaasmeyer said.

The tournament will begin at 9:30 a.m. and will consist of two rounds and two divisions, professional and amateur. Discs Unlimited of Herrington, Kan., is sponsoring cash prizes to the professionals and other items to the amateurs playing.

"It's fairly hard to establish a new course," Klaasmeyer said. "We are expecting a good turnout because everyone is curious or excited about what is going on. This isn't a mainstream sport."

A portion of the entry fees are reinvested in the course, said Brandon Heath, senior in marketing and member of the Manhattan Disc Golf Club.

"I think the scenery is better than a lot of the courses in Kansas," Heath said. "There aren't a lot of altitude changes, but this course focuses more on finesse shots. We use a lot of obstacles. It's as good as any other course in Kansas.

"The state park has been very cooperative and everybody's real excited to hear about the basketed course," he said.

There will be about 75 to 80 people attending the tournament this weekend, said Jason Springer, junior in chemical engineering and treasurer of the Manhattan Disc Golf Club.

"We are bringing in a group from Kansas City, Salina, Topeka, Wichita, Emporia — all the major Kansas cities," he said. "We have about five or six hours of work left on the course and then we'll be ready for Sunday."

Disc golf has been played for about 25 years and still changes as people become involved, Klaasmeyer said.

"Disc golf is very similar to ball golf," he said. "You are hurtling a projectile to an object, but in this case the projectile is a disc and not a ball."

Normally, participants don't have to pay fees in disc golf, Klaasmeyer said.

"It attracts all kinds of people because it's easier and cheaper than ball golf," he said.

The Manhattan Disc Golf Club also has established a makeshift course on the K-State campus.

"The makeshift course kind of interferes with students right now," Klaasmeyer said. "So we've been working non-stop everyday to get this new course built."

This year's contest has several added twists, with a shot at the Big 12 Conference title — and even the national championship — on the line.

Thousands of crazed fans carry off the north endzone goalpost after K-State's 40-30 win over Nebraska last year in KSU Stadium.

Cats face biggest challenge of season in Saturday's game against Nebraska

STORIES BY JOSHUA KINDER

Nothing more needs to be used to describe the No. 5 K-State Wildcats' matchup Saturday against the No. 7 Nebraska Cornhuskers than "do or die."

That phrase holds true if the Cats want to have a shot at the Big 12 Championship or a national championship this season.

The immediate roadblock for the Cats (9-0, 6-0) is the Cornhuskers (8-1, 5-1), who are coming off a 37-0 shutout victory against Texas A&M, while last week the Cats avoided a fourth-quarter upset for a 20-13 win over Colorado.

After beating Nebraska 40-30 last season, head coach Bill Snyder said some of the pressure is off this season. He said he hopes his team believes in the system well enough to let it work for them.

"I would guess it has to," Snyder said of reducing some pressure with last season's win. "I haven't really thought about it that way, and I haven't referenced our players in that respect.

"I would like to think that you have the feeling that doing the right things and preparing well, that you could have success anywhere, vs. anyone, and not have to have the precedent take place first."

Sophomore linebacker Ben Leber said the Cats will have no trouble mentally preparing for the game.

"You have to be brain dead to not be motivated to play these guys," Leber said. "The coaches can only do so much. Inside every one of us, we're extremely excited and really motivated. We're ready to go out and play."

The Huskers bring, as usual, a powerful rushing attack to the contest. Junior running back Dan Alexander thus far has led the Huskers with 664 yards, but sophomore Eric Crouch is a close second with 536 yards. Junior Correll Buckhalter also has accounted for 492 yards.

Leber said the Husker's running attack is a challenge, but nothing the Cats doesn't try to meet every week.

"It's a big challenge," Leber said. "It's always been our priority to stop the run, and we knew that if we can stop the run and get people to pass, we have a better shot.

"With Nebraska, they don't care. If they get stuffed, they're going to run it again. They're stubborn just like we are. It's going to be a challenge."

Last season, the Cats managed to hold Nebraska to 351 yards, 212 of which were on the ground. Crouch led the Huskers with 108 and completed 10 of 21 passes for 139 yards.

Crouch, who is in charge of running Nebraska's option, could prove to be a threat, but the Cats also feature the nation's No. 2 defense, surrendering only 232.3 yards per game. They rank 12th against the run, and first against the pass.

Snyder said Crouch is working toward becoming one of the best Husker quarterbacks ever.

"Crouch is, and I think they feel the same way, a guy that's headed in the same direction of some of the great quarterbacks that they have had. He's a very skilled athlete, can do some really great things.

"He threw the ball so well against us last year and ran the ball well against us last year. He handles their option very well."

One advantage for the Huskers is that the game is in Lincoln at Memorial Stadium, a place K-State hasn't walked away from with a win since 1968. Even more overwhelming is that Nebraska has compiled a 73-3 record at home in the past 11 seasons.

Photographer earns recognition

It was the night of Nov. 14, 1998.

On that night, the K-State Wildcats made history, defeating the Nebraska Cornhuskers for the first time in 30 years, but that wasn't the only history made.

Craig Hacker, a freelance photographer and 1996 K-State graduate, captured what was to be his best sporting moment on film thus far in his career.

Late in K-State's 40-30 victory, linebacker Travis Ochs made a beeline for quarterback Eric Crouch, and before Hacker realized it, he just had frozen a piece of history on film.

Ochs nearly ripped Crouch's head off on fourth down with a clear — but referee-ignored — face-mask infraction on what was the Huskers' final chance to change the outcome of their eventual loss. This happened just after Hacker noticed other photographers leaving the sidelines to prepare for postgame.

"At the end of the game, a big game, a history-making game, I began to wonder if I should go to the stands and shoot the fans or should I stay here," Hacker said. "I felt fortunate and lucky to get it, actually. I got lucky that that happened to be the play at the time.

"My heart was going at 90 mph, and I had to make a decision and stay focused. It was a real chaotic time. I had to plan ahead because when the clock hits zeros, I have to do something. I couldn't just stand there."

Hacker, a former Collegian freelance photographer, said that covering the history-making game was

When the K-State offense strolls into Lincoln, Neb., on Saturday, the Wildcats will face a Cornhusker defense ranked No. 4 in total defense, allowing a shade under 235 yards per game.

Head coach Bill Snyder compared the Nebraska defense to K-State's, saying it has several of the same attributes the Wildcats have.

"They're excellent, fast, aggressive, well coached — just excellent players," Snyder said.

K-State head football coach Bill Snyder, who is not known for being effusive with his praise, has said Wildcat senior linebacker Mark Simoneau deserves everything there is to win.

JON BALMER

Let me get my venting out of the way first.

Hypothetically, let's say you've got a No. 5 BCS team clashing with the No. 6 team Saturday. On the same day, the No. 2 team welcomes a squad that doesn't even register on the BCS top 15 list.

Cross country teams to run toward nationals at NCAA regional meet

By Sarah Craig
Kansas State Collegian

It's do-or-die this weekend at the Midwest Regional Cross Country meet as the Cats try to qualify for the NCAA meet. The top-two teams from each region make it to nationals.

The No. 7 women's team, the highest-ranked team in the meet, is the reigning Midwest champion. Head coach Randy Cole said his team is capable of maintaining that title.

"We want to go there and take care of business," Cole said. "Obviously, this meet is the championship meet in itself — to lay claim to be the top team in the Midwest, but it's also the meet to qualify for nationals.

"We want to go in there and do well and use this for the upswing before nationals, but those other schools are coming in to get us so we have to put together a good race."

Runner Annie Wetterhus said the team knows what it has to do and is fully capable, having won the meet last year.

"My own personal goal is to place in the top 10, and if we have four place in the top 10 and then the fifth in the top 25, then we should win it easily," Wetterhus said.

On the men's side, Cole said he anticipates his top-two runners, Brandon Jessop and Jean-Paul Niyongabo, will qualify for nationals but is not as certain about the team as a whole qualifying. In order to qualify individually, runners must be one of the top-four runners from a team that did not qualify.

"I think Brandon and Jean-Paul have an excellent shot at getting an individual qualifying berth," Cole said. "They've just got to run smart and be in position there in the last part of the race to hang tough."

Jessop said he would like to see his entire team qualify and hopes he can see some of the middle runners step up to help the team.

"In a field of 31 teams, if you can have two guys in about the top five, that's about half your

Basketball team loses exhibition

By Frank Flaton
Kansas State Collegian

K-State had 18 turnovers and shot only 31 percent as the Wildcats lost an exhibition game to the NBC Thunder 75-59 Thursday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Cats lost their second exhibition game this season and look to improve heading into their first-round preseason National Invitational Tournament matchup against Arizona.

"We cannot play like this against Arizona," point guard Galen Morrison said. "I can't explain this. Our shots just weren't falling, and we didn't play very good defense."

The Wildcats led only once, as the Thunder was 14-of-40 on three-point shots, while K-State hit only 18 percent from three-point range.

"We certainly gave ourselves opportunities for various room for improvement," Coach Tom Asbury said. "That game came down to their success on the perimeter and our lack of success in the perimeter."

Tony Kitt and Morrison led the Wildcats with 13 points each. The Wildcats, who are attempting to rebound from the loss of seven seniors to graduation, received little production from veteran guard/forward Josh Reid and several newcomers.

Reid didn't make a shot from the floor, while freshman Quentin Buchanan, who tossed in 10 points in the Cats' exhibition opener, was scoreless.

Kitt said the Wildcat newcomers still have a lot of learning to do.

"We missed a lot of shots we don't usually miss," Kitt said. "We have a lot of newcomers, and they have no concept of what is about to happen."

The Thunder rumbled to an early 19-13 lead as five of its first seven scores were made on three-point shots.

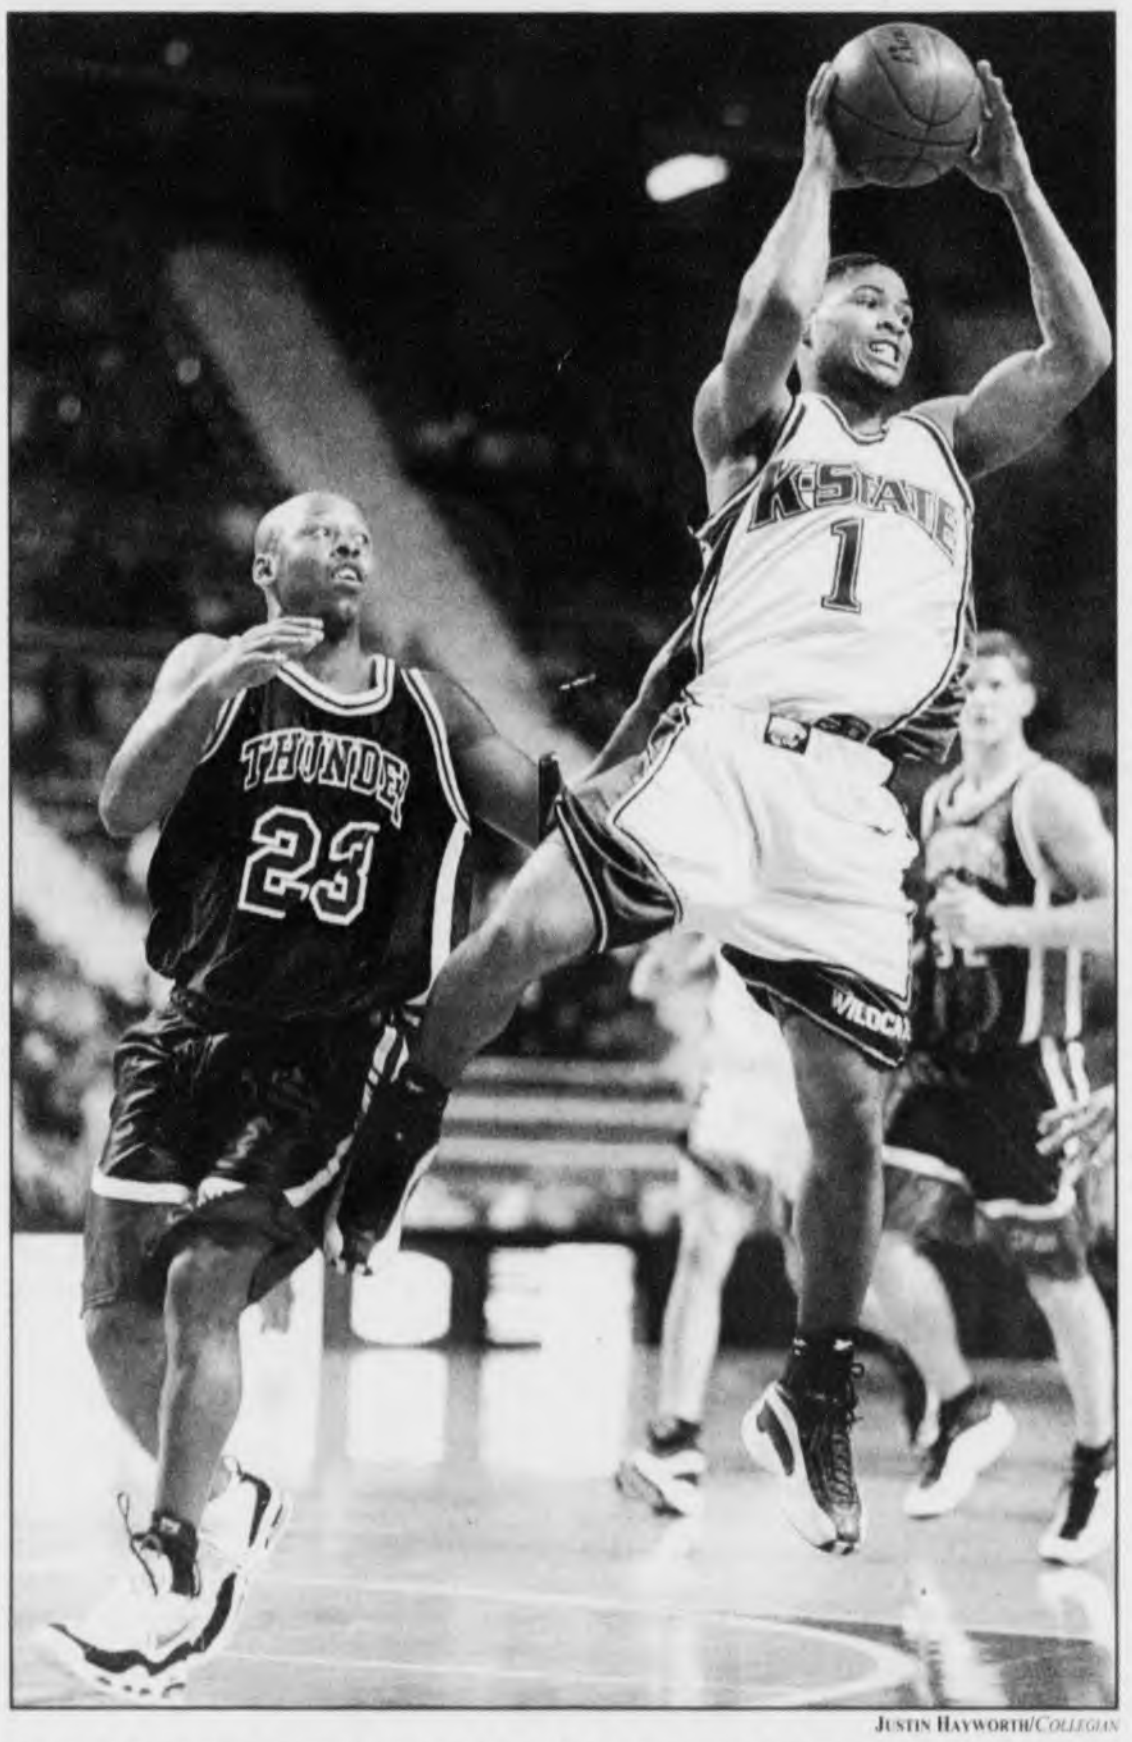
K-State got their only lead at 23-22 with 8:38 to go when Morrison stole a pass and took it the length of the floor.

The Thunder contained the Cats and went on a 22-9 run to end the half with a 44-34 lead.



In the second half, the Wildcats shot a dismal 26.9 percent from the floor as the Thunder rolled to the victory.

K-State lost its exhibition opener to the California All-Stars 79-78. The Wildcats have lost seven exhibition games in a row, dating back to the 1996-97 season.

Despite the performance, Asbury said the Wildcats have to be ready for Arizona.

"It was not an effective performance," he said.

"But, we will move on. I don't know if anybody is ready to be this good during the season, but if you don't play Arizona, you lose the opportunity to play a good team."

"It's certainly a factor," Snyder said of the Huskers playing at home. "Virtually everyone you would talk to would address going to Lincoln, Nebraska, as probably the most difficult stadium to play in our conference. I think that's the normal perception. I don't disagree with that. It's not an easy place to play."

Snyder said the key for his Cats is to stay focused, despite playing in front of a little more than 72,000 crazed Husker fans.

"Outside of the preparation during the week, once you get there, and this is true whether it's Nebraska, going to Texas, going to Oklahoma State, or going up to Ames, Iowa, you have to keep the game between the white lines," Snyder said. "If that's that case, then there's some continuity. The space is the same, there's no reason why it should be different if it was here or some place else."

The Cats' struggling offense, anchored by struggling quarterback Jonathan Beasley, might be in for the challenge of the season when they meet up with the country's No. 4 total defense, relinquishing just 234.6 yards a game.

Junior Joe Hall is expected to start for K-State at running back, with junior David Allen seeing significant action as well. Senior Frank Murphy's status is still unknown. Snyder said Tuesday that the decision on Murphy's playing availability will be made just prior to kickoff. Last week, Murphy returned after being sidelined with a high ankle sprain. He ran seven times for just 3 yards.

Fullback Johnno Lazetich remains sidelined because of a concussion suffered against Baylor. Hall and junior defensive end Monty Beisel both will see time at fullback.

especially emotional for him, considering he was a K-State graduate and had not previously witnessed a Wildcat victory over the Huskers.

"It was big as a K-Stater," Hacker said. "I became overcome with personal feelings. When your school is about to change history, it's kind of emotional. It was hard to stay focused on the job and what you're doing, keeping your vision."

Two days after the game, Hacker finally realized what he had shot. That Monday, Hacker recognized the photo was one of his best but didn't expect what was to come.

"I had no idea that Crouch had been face-masked like that," Hacker said. "I didn't even have a clue that that was what I had on the field until early Monday morning."

He e-mailed Sports Illustrated and informed them that he had a picture that might interest them. It wasn't long until Hacker's photo was on a plane with New York as its final destination. In fact, his photo was featured in SI's "Leading Off" section of the Nov. 23, 1998, issue a week later.

The photo was selected to be in SI's "Century's Greatest Sports Photos" issue, published July 26. Due to the honor, the photo, along with the others in the Sports Illustrated exhibit, currently is on a national tour of college universities. The tour will conclude at the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl in Tempe, Ariz. Jan. 2, 2000.

For Hacker, SI's honoring of the picture was a surprise because his work was being recognized with other photographers he had grown up trying to emulate.

"To me, the impact of it, was the company I was in," Hacker said. "I looked through that set of pictures and saw pictures that I used to set my standards with. I always looked at those photos and thought that this is the level that my work has to be at, if I want to be that good.

"It's a good feeling, but I don't by any means think that I deserve to be in that company."

Since its showing in SI, the photo has received several awards. The National Press Photographers Association awarded the photo a first-place finish in the Sports Action category. It later earned another honor, this time from the 56th Annual Pictures of the Year Contest, where it won an Award of Excellence in the Magazine Sports Action category.

Since leaving K-State and the Collegian, Hacker's work has appeared in The New York Times, Los Angeles Times, The Wichita Eagle, Newsweek, U.S. News and World Report, Business 2.0 and USA Today.

Upon graduation, Hacker spent a year working as an intern for The Sporting News, where he shot 105 sporting events, including Major League Baseball, the NFL, NBA and college athletics.

Saturday, Hacker will make his way to Lincoln to shoot this year's K-State/Nebraska game, where he will attempt to freeze another moment in time.

"I waited 10 years for that one," Hacker said. "I'll probably have to wait another 10 years for the next one. It's in the back of my mind, but I would like for it to happen again."

As defensive coaches often say, it all starts up front. Rush ends Aaron Wills and Kyle Vanden Bosch have followed in the footsteps of former Nebraska greats Grant Wistrom, Mike Rucker and Chad Kelsay.

Wills is third on the team in tackles with 46, and Vanden Bosch is third on the team in tackles-for-loss with seven.

Tackles Steve Warren and Loran Kaiser provide the bulk in the middle for the Cornhuskers. Warren, at 6 feet 2 inches and 305 pounds, and Kaiser, at 6 feet 4 inches and 295 pounds, form one of the largest inside tandems in the Big 12.

Warren leads the team in tackles-for-loss with 11 and in sacks with six, while Kaiser has chipped in 24 tackles, four for losses, and has 1.5 sacks.

"They've got some pretty good athletes up front as well as pretty good size and speed," senior left guard Ian Moses said. "They've got a lot of schemes that they throw at you, so it's just a matter of understanding the schemes and being able to pick them up."

The Cornhuskers' linebacker corp is led by Carlos Polk, a 6-foot-2 inch, 250-pound middle linebacker who is second on the team in tackles with 62 and in tackles-for-loss with nine.

With sam linebackers Tony Ortiz and Brain Shaw and will linebackers Eric Johnson and Julius Jackson thrown into the mix as well, Nebraska has plenty of depth and experience.

"Carlos Polk is one of the best linebackers we've faced this year," junior quarterback Jonathan Beasley said. "They all fly to the ball, and they've got great team speed. We've got our work cut out for us."

The outlook isn't much better for the K-State offense when looking at the Nebraska secondary.

Rated by several publications as one of the best entering the season, the Cornhuskers secondary has lived up to the hype and is third in the nation in pass efficiency defense, allowing opposing quarterbacks to compile a rating of 88.3.

Cornerback Ralph Brown and rover Mike Brown are both potential all-Americans. Ralph Brown was a third-team All-American last season, while Mike Brown was a first team all-Big 12 selection.

Mike Brown, whom Beasley called the hardest hitting safety in the Big 12, leads the team in tackles with 68 and in interceptions, having picked off four passes so far. Ralph Brown has two interceptions and has broken up 10 passes on the season.

"Ralph Brown is by far one of the best defensive backs in the Big 12," sophomore wide receiver Aaron Lockett said.

Often lost in the shuffle is the other cornerback, Keyuo Craver, and free safety Clint Finley. Craver leads the team in passes broken up with 11. Finley has 21 tackles for the year and has the distinction of being the only Cornhusker in the secondary to recover a fumble.

As if the Cornhusker defense wasn't enough, K-State will have to play in what Snyder said is the loudest stadium in the Big 12.

"You just have to keep a level head," Lockett said. "It's definitely going to be loud; it's definitely going to be intimidating, but I think we're capable."

K-State did manage to put up 512 yards total offense against Nebraska in last season's 40-30 Wildcat win, giving the Wildcats the confidence to win again.

"That gives us encouragement that it can be done," Lockett said. "Once you do it once, you know you can do it twice, and I think that's our mentality going into the game."

OFFENSE

their practice facilities at migraine-inducing levels.

Any lost sleep for the football team's neighbors is the price of progress as the Wildcats hurry to fine-tune their struggling offense.

K-State limps into Saturday's showdown for control of the Big 12 North Division on the heels of its least-productive game of the season offensively.

The Colorado Buffaloes held K-State to an average of barely more than 2 yards rushing in last weekend's game, and held Wildcat quarterbacks to only six completions on 18 passing attempts. The Wildcats only could muster 197 yards total offense at home in a 20-14 triumph.

Quarterback Jonathan Beasley said the offense understands that it must improve to succeed this week.

"We know that offensively we didn't play up to our capabilities," Beasley said. "We know that we can't play like we did, this week against Nebraska."

The Wildcats now must rally from that performance in one of the most difficult venues on the college football map.

Lincoln's Memorial Stadium is renowned for being a loud and hostile environment for opposing teams, and with the stakes high in Saturday's game, the Husker faithful no doubt will do their utmost to uphold that reputation.

That could create problems for the Wildcat offense, which relies heavily on audibles and adjustments at the line of scrimmage. Beasley said the team has practiced many techniques, hand signals among them, to ensure that the offense is able to function on Saturday.

Even more of an impediment to the offense's function than the stadium however, might be the defense that resides there. The Nebraska "Blackshirts" have earned their own renown this season, ranked fourth in the nation in overall defense.

"Excellent" is the appraisal given them by no less an authority than Snyder. Audibling will be only one of Beasley's concerns against Nebraska. Another will be a Husker secondary ranked third in the nation in pass efficiency defense, and coming off of a four-interception performance against Texas A&M last weekend.

Beasley was one of many struggling Wildcats against Colorado, as he was able to connect on only five of 12 passes for 88 yards before being replaced by Adam Helm.

Though the week before the season's biggest game is probably not an ideal time to have an off day, Beasley said his Colorado difficulties won't affect his preparation this week.

"It's just one of those things that happens," Beasley said. "It's nothing that's really going to hurt my demeanor or anything. I know that I didn't play great, and I just have to learn from that."

Beasley's learning curve will be accelerated if he's aided in the backfield by a healthy Frank Murphy and David Allen on Saturday. Allen said he is 95 percent healthy, and although Murphy's status once again will be a game-time decision, he was healthy enough to play last weekend.

Regardless of who mans the backfield, most K-State players said the first thing they must do to rebound from their recent struggles offensively is to avoid mistakes.

Mistakes have made things interesting for K-State on previous road trips. Early struggles led to 21-point deficits against both Iowa State and Oklahoma State, and the Wildcats also had to stage a comeback to defeat Texas in Austin as well.

Snyder said his team will face an uphill battle Saturday if it continues its pattern of stumbling out of the gate.

"I don't think anyone wants to fall behind in Lincoln, Nebraska," Snyder said. "Been there, done that. It's not fun."

Last weekend, the Wildcats made their share of mistakes as well. K-State helped Colorado's defense to shut them down, piling up 12 penalties for 98 yards.

Allen said the Wildcats know the stakes are higher this week, and that they have no intention of repeating their follies.

"I don't think it was Colorado's defense last week. I think it was our offense that stopped itself," Allen said. "So many penalties last week, and we turned the ball over and this and that. We can't do that. That's one thing you definitely can't do against Nebraska. It's a bigger game.

BUTKUS

football's top linebacker. Joining Simoneau as finalists are Penn State's Brandon Short and LaVar Arrington, and Tennessee's Raynoch Thompson.

Simoneau said after the announcement that he was humbled to be included in such lofty company.

"To be mentioned with all of the other great linebackers around the country this year, being a finalist for the Butkus is just really exciting for me and humbling, and it's a great honor," he said. "I'm just thankful."

Simoneau has forged his way into the nation's defensive elite with what is shaping up as the best of his four seasons in K-State's lineup. Simoneau leads the Wildcats in total tackles (71), unassisted tackles (52), and sacks (6.5). His 16 tackles-for-loss lead the Big 12, and he also has two interceptions, returning one 37 yards for a touchdown.

Of the four finalists, Simoneau is tied for first in tackles-for-loss and ranks second in both tackles and sacks.

The announcement merely is the latest in a long line of accolades for Simoneau, a four-year starter from Smith Center, Kan. Already this season he has been the Big 12 defensive player of the week three times in K-State's nine games, after games against Texas and Kansas and most recently after last weekend's 20-14 win over Colorado.

Simoneau previously was selected as a second-team All-American last season and as first-team All-Big 12 the past two seasons. He is only the second player in K-State history to be made a team captain three times.

Snyder credited Simoneau's dedication for his many successes on the football field.

"He is undeniably the most focused football player in a long career of coaching that I've ever been around," Snyder said. "He gets more from the great talent that he has than any player I've had the opportunity to be around."

That intense focus was on display during the conference call. Simoneau quickly dispelled the idea that the timing of the announcement — two days before K-State's pivotal game against Nebraska — might be a distraction for him or his teammates.

"I definitely don't think it's going to be a distraction," he said. "I'm focused on Nebraska, and hearing the news of being a finalist is probably going to help pump me up more than anything. Our team's going to be focused on Nebraska this weekend, and we're going to play hard."

The award is named for former University of Illinois and Chicago Bears standout and NFL Hall of Fame linebacker Dick Butkus.

This year's four finalists and their coaches will travel to Orlando Fla., on Dec. 10, where the winner, determined by 28 media members who make up the Butkus Award panel, will be announced during the Butkus Award Gala at Hard Rock Live at Universal Studios CityWalk in Orlando.

team," Jessop said. "So I'm asking three guys to move up just a little more than they have been this year as far as standards and pushing themselves, and I think if we can have three of our guys do that, we can qualify."

Cole said some of these athletes, most of whom are freshmen and sophomores, will improve significantly over a longer course of time than this season.

"Where they are physically, a lot of them aren't getting everything they can out of what they have to offer," Cole said. "Physically, they're not limited it's just mentally they've got to get stronger."

Teams that do not place in the top two still have the chance to qualify as an at-large team, determined by the NCAA Championships Committee.

destinations. Oh yeah, your crew's also visited the No. 2 team earlier this season.

So, utilizing the knowledge and intuition that have landed you this coveted post, you go with the game that will draw the most attention on the national landscape.

Thank the spirit of Touchdown XI ESPN's "College Gameday" possesses the insight we all lack to realize a return to Blacksburg, Va., is far more intriguing than the Big 12 North division battle in Lincoln.

I am humbled by the wisdom of Herbstreit, Fowler, Corso and Co.

Regardless of ESPN's decision, K-State vs. Nebraska remains THE GAME. There won't be as much hype as last season when motor homes started rolling into Manhattan in July for the big Nov. 14 showdown. Alumni won't sit around telling students wild tales of the last time the Cats beat the Huskers. Heck, until this week, talk of K-State vs. Nebraska was shunned as premature speculation by many (You know, the same people who bought their "Better Dead Than Red" T-shirts months before the big game).

Still, this game is so much more important than K-State's 30-year Big Red itch nearly a year ago to the day.

The reason: Lincoln; Memorial Stadium; Tom Osborne Field; 31 years of frustration.

The Huskers' house of horrors continues to haunt K-State. Even if that plain red-stenciled "N" on Nebraska's helmet no longer represents the Cats' scarlet letter, Memorial Stadium and its 74,000-plus seats of red remain.

The Sherman tank of Big 12 stadiums only got stronger this summer with a $36.1 million stadium improvement project. This included 42 new skyboxes, a club seating area and a new media facility that makes KSU Stadium's Dev Nelson Press Box look like a trailer home.

These improvements only add to Memorial Stadium madness. More than the players, the coaches or the history, this mythical concoction of manmade noise and a giant sea of red has managed to take opponents, including K-State, out of their game throughout the years.

"It's wild, it's rowdy, it's loud," wide receiver Aaron Lockett said. "If you've never seen red, you'll see it this weekend."

It's more than the sight of a crimson blanket wrapped around you that crumbles visiting teams. Somehow, little bits of Cornhusker lore combine to eventually vanquish the Cats.

K-State's 1997 meeting at Memorial Stadium started fairly well. Michael Bishop answered Scott Frost's opening touchdown drive with one of his own, and although the Cats trailed 20-6 at the break, the outcome was far from decided.

Until the third quarter, when Bill Snyder's squad imploded and allowed 21 points right out of the gate en route to a 56-26 defeat.

"You really can't (prepare for the crowd)," linebacker Ben Leber said. "We practice in front of crowd noise at least once or twice a week, but nothing's going to prepare you. You could have a guy following you around and screaming in your ear all the time.

"It's going to be loud. There's nothing you can do to prepare."

Preparing for the onslaught of sound isn't the key. There really isn't any secret weapon to combat the Cats' losing ways in Lincoln. The stakes should be enough.

This game goes beyond Cornhusker conquest. Conference title control — as well as that slim shot at the most coveted item Sears ever has produced (the national championship trophy, sponsored by the retail king) — is the motivating factor between these two teams.

The Memorial Stadium mystique definitely will be there Saturday afternoon, but it will take a back seat to more important issues this year. No need for Knute Rockne speeches, no extra time practicing with noise. The element of motivation is already in place. It's Nebraska week once again.

"You got to be brain-dead not to be motivated to play these guys," Leber said.

Don't worry. The brain-dead won't be in Lincoln on Saturday. They'll be busy promoting the Virginia Tech-Miami game.

At Wamego High, school was still in session, but activities like the blood drive and the school play, which Sester was starring in, were canceled.

Doug Conwell, superintendent of schools for Wamego USD 320, said they have a crisis plan to address the grief students were experiencing.

"We have brought in additional counselors, and they will be available throughout the day, tomorrow morning and Monday," Conwell said. "There will also be support available on the day of the funeral."

The school also had area church leaders available for counseling.

Hernandez said her friend was popular at the school, and most people were taking her loss hard.

"The whole school is coming together and are looking out for one another. Popularity is being put aside," Hernandez said. "She was well known and respected. She was my best friend, and we'll never forget her."

Senate interns gain experience, networking

By LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jeremy Stohs, freshman in political science, didn't know what he wanted to do when he came to college, but he knew he wanted to get involved. Becoming a Student Senate intern seemed like just the ticket.

"When I came to enroll, I talked to a former senator, then he gave me an application," Stohs said.

Adam Hemmen, freshman in mass communications, said he also was looking for a way to be a leader on campus.

"This is one of the best things to get involved in," Hemmen said. "It seemed like an opportunity I couldn't pass up."

Senate interns are a diverse group this year in a variety of majors with many different interests.

Many of the interns got involved like Stohs and Hemmen, either through friends or other senators.

"Friends from high school told me good things about SGA, so when I came up here for the tour, I got info on being an intern, filled out the application and got a call back," Leslie Perrin, freshman in bakery science, said.

Others like Heidi Durflinger, freshman in open-option, heard about it through their sororities and fraternities.

> "I've just met people and made an awesome network of friends."
> — Amy Metzinger, intern coordinator

The application process is a long one. This year, 87 students applied for positions, Amy Metzinger, intern coordinator, said. Forty were interviewed, and 24 made the final cut.

"We had to fill out what you were involved in and what you can bring to SGA," said Elizabeth Richardson, freshman in biology and international studies.

During the interviews, three current senators asked the applicants on-the-spot questions, such as naming their best and worst qualities.

"I just remember getting really nervous. I thought what can I say that's bad, but not really bad?" Amber Blake, sophomore in marketing, said.

The biggest reason for wanting the job, according to the interns, is for campus involvement. Sarah Sourk, freshman in political science and journalism, said she has learned a lot about what's going on on campus.

Durflinger said for her, the opportunity to express her own opinions is important.

Layne Stafford, sophomore in agricultural economics, said he agrees.

"You can speak your mind and talk to people with opposite views," Stafford said.

The interns said they are learning a lot about Senate. Richardson said the senators are doing a good job as mentors, but surprises were inevitable.

"I was surprised by the complexity of Senate, but it's good that there are students who really want to make K-State a better place," Richardson said.

Metzinger said interns get involved with Senate for the experience, not to build a résumé or make politics a career.

"I'm not expecting to be a senator from Kansas or anything," Metzinger said. "I've just met people and made an awesome network of friends."

The interns have one project to accomplish, but they haven't quite figured out what they want to do.

"We're thinking of holding a leadership conference for high school seniors, telling them what college is like and how to get involved on campus," Andrew Hayhurst, freshman in pre-physical therapy, said.

As for becoming full-fledged senators, the interns don't become senators automatically the following year. They still have to launch a campaign and win the most votes.

"Sometimes it will be 25 people running for four spots," Stafford said. "It can be tough."

Pharmacies underfill prescriptions, continue to bill government in full

By AMY GREEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Taxpayers are getting shortchanged by a common practice in some pharmacies: Druggists underfill some prescriptions when they run short on medicines but still bill government insurance programs for the full amount.

Authorities say the practice, called "shortfilling," costs taxpayers tens of millions of dollars a year because it is usually done with Medicaid patients and others who use federal health programs.

Two of the nation's largest drug store chains recently have settled legal claims over shortfilling.

The Justice Department said other cases are pending against additional drug stores but won't elaborate, saying the lawsuits have been sealed.

"We believe the practice is widespread, but I can't give you the specifics of the extent of what we're looking at now," spokeswoman Chris Watney said. "It's a problem that could happen at any pharmacy."

When a pharmacist "shortfills" a prescription, the customer usually is encouraged to return later for the rest of their medication, federal authorities said.

Many people fail to return, but some pharmacies still charge government health programs for the full prescription.

Kendall Lynch, director of the Tennessee Board of Pharmacy, said the computer systems many pharmacies use to bill government health programs cannot pro-rate shortfilled prescriptions.

"You have to do it manually, and I don't think I have to tell you how much more (time-consuming) it is do it manually," Lynch said.

The nation's largest drug store chain, Walgreen Co., agreed in September to pay $7.6 million and revamp its computer system to track and appropriately bill for partially filled prescriptions. The move resolved claims with 25 states and Puerto Rico.

Florida and Tennessee filed similar claims as part of a federal suit against Eckerd Corp., the drug chain owned by J.C. Penney. Tennessee settled its portion of the suit last month for $200,000.

The lawsuits against Eckerd and Walgreen originally were brought in 1995 by a whistle-blower, Louis Mueller, an Eckerd pharmacist in Clearwater, Fla., who watched others shortfilling prescriptions.

Mueller says he complained to a supervisor but got nowhere, so he sued. The Justice Department began investigating in 1996 and joined the lawsuits in 1998.

The Deerfield, Ill.-based Walgreen was accused of shortfilling 4 million prescriptions and overcharging government health-care programs $21 million.

The lawsuit against Largo, Fla.-based Eckerd, the nation's fourth-largest chain, charges it shortfilled 180,000 prescriptions and overcharged $11 million.

Mueller's complaint said Eckerd required pharmacists to pro-rate the price of partially filled prescriptions for cash-paying and privately insured customers, but not for those covered by Medicaid and other government health programs. Walgreen did the same thing, federal authorities said.

Walgreen and Eckerd denied any wrongdoing.

"We followed the industry practice of filling the prescription partially in order to get the patients started on their prescriptions and then asked the patients to return to pick up the rest when we had more in stock," Walgreen spokesman Michael Polzin said. "The majority of patients did just that."

Because Mueller filed his lawsuits under the False Claims Act, he will pocket up to 25 percent of the money the government recovers.

That's at least $674,264 in the Walgreen settlement and another $12,350 in the Eckerd settlement, so far.

Mueller, who still works part-time for Eckerd, said the lawsuits were not about money.

"It was the American public they were ripping off. We're all taxpayers. We all contribute to the Medicaid system," Mueller said. "I don't believe it would have changed unless someone like me came along."

Fans making trek to Lincoln, Neb., have more to look foward to than football

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

There's more to Lincoln, Neb., than football.

Aside from the sea of red, the Capitol City offers a variety of entertainment options for the K-State students making the trip to Lincoln this weekend.

For the more than 4,000 Wildcat fans expected to attend Saturday's Big 12 North showdown between No. 5 K-State and No. 6 Nebraska, the city of Lincoln will be festive, to say the least.

For instance, Wildcat fans who won't join the crowd of more than 75,000 in Memorial Stadium can watch the game from a number of area sports bars.

A crowd of purple will fill the Main Street Cafe at 1325 O St., located in walking distance from the stadium. There, hosts Matt Walters and Tim Fitzgerald will broadcast Powercat Gameday on KMAN-AM 1350 and KMKF-FM 101.5.

"It's a high-profile game, so I'm sure there will be a fair share of purple in Lincoln," Walters said. "We're hoping they all come by the Main Street Cafe and kind of congregate and rally there before they head over to the game."

Main Street Cafe's doors open at 9 a.m., with the live pregame show starting at 10:50 a.m. Kickoff is at 2:30 p.m.

Other sports bars should be packed this weekend as well, with Cornhusker stadium sitting right next to downtown Lincoln.

Lane Hickenbottom, a senior in news editorial at the University of Nebraska, said establishments such as BW-3, a nationally owned sports bar and grill, and WC's both should be busy this weekend.

Lincoln's main strip of bar/grills and night clubs lies on O Street, between 13th Street and Centennial Mall.

"It's definitely a good place to go," Hickenbottom said. "Downtown gets pretty busy on Fridays and Saturdays of home games."

Attractions include clubs such as the Brass Rail, The Iguanas, Bodega's Alley, Duffy's Tavern, Club 1427, Sandy's and O'Rourke's Tavern.

Many places in Lincoln feature live music, such as Knickerbockers Bar & Grill, Zoo Bar, and occasionally P.O. Pears.

One of the Capitol City's new bars is Mickey's Pub, which Hickenbottom said has been quite the hot spot this year.

In Lincoln's historic Haymarket District, one can visit places such as Old Chicago, Doc's Place or Rogues Gallery.

In addition to the bars and clubs, Wildcat fans also should experience some of Lincoln's dining establishments.

One of two breweries in the Capitol City, Crane River Brewpub & Cafe offers an eclectic selection of hearty American cuisine, traditional European fare and regional specialities.

The establishment features a bar made of gravel from the Platte River and handcrafted beer brewed on the premises. Brewery tours are available on Saturdays from 1 to 4 p.m. or can be scheduled at other times for convenience.

Crane River is located at 200 N. 11th St. in the renovated historic Commercial Club building, which still contains the original storefront windows and original tile floors. To make arrangements for brewery tours or party rooms, call (402) 434-3755.

Lazlo's Brewery & Grill is the oldest and largest brewery in Nebraska. It is located in the Haymarket District at 710 P St., boasting fresh beer and a wide selection of food. Brewery tours are available and can be arranged by calling (402) 434-5970.

Hickenbottom said Yia Yia's and Barrymore's also are good eating establishments.

However, K-State fans should avoid Misty's Restaurant & Lounge, located at 6235 Havelock Ave. The decor features Nebraska Cornhusker memorabilia, and Husker fans from all over the state gather at the bar/grill for Saturday home games.

Wildcat fans traveling to Nebraska on Friday might wish to check out Lincoln's variety of shopping centers.

The Gateway Shopping Center is located at 61st and O streets, and the South Point Pavilion is an outdoor mall.

Parties across country tune in when Cats take field

By KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Corn on the cob, corn dogs and candy corn were on the menu in Dallas last year for the Nebraska-K-State football game.

Around 450 people attended this football watch party in Dallas to see the Cats beat Nebraska, 40-30.

Audrey Mross, president of the Kansas State Texans, said the management at the Fox and Hound sports bar in north Dallas, where they watch the games, is good to their group and planned the entire corn menu so they could "consume" the Cornhuskers.

"Last year, they purchased Powercat T-shirts for their servers to wear," Mross said.

Dallas is one of the 55 cities across the country with K-State football watch parties. Mitzi Frieling, assistant director of student and out-of-state programs at the KSU Alumni Association, said most of them have about 20 or more fans attending, but some, like the ones in Dallas, are as big as 200-300 people.

"This one's the biggest game, and so everyone is just extra excited," Frieling said. The bars just love the business."

Mross said there are more than 4,000 K-State alumni in the Dallas area, and typically their watch parties range from 100 people to 450 for the Nebraska game.

Mross said there have been fewer parties this year because a lot of the games haven't been televised, and they only have had four parties out of the nine games so far this season.

She said the smallest one this year was the Texas game, with 50 people, because a lot people traveled to the game. They are expecting a large turnout for Saturday's game, Mross said.

"I would not be surprised if we did what we did last year," she said.

The attendance of the Dallas watch parties has increased the past couple of years. Mross said they moved locations about four years ago from a neighborhood bar to the Fox and Hound, where they get their own room and a 125-inch big screen television to watch the game on.

"It looks like a drive-in movie," she said.

The number of watch parties in the United States also has increased from 43 last year to 55 this year, Frieling said.

"They tend to grow with the the success of the team," she said.

Frieling said that at the beginning of every season, the Alumni Association sends out decorations as well as door prizes to the coordinators of each watch party. However, she said, a lot of people save the prizes until this game since it is the biggest.

Mross said their group typically waits until this game to do its raffle. She said everyone gets excited about K-State merchandise because they don't have Varney's Book Store or the K-State Student Union Bookstore just across the street.

"We can't buy that stuff down here," she said. "They pay big bucks for that stuff."

The Alumni Association does a preseason mailing each year with the locations of every watch party and a contact person, but Frieling said they still receive a lot of phone calls each week from people wanting to see the game. She said she has to send out the satellite coordinates for the game each week to the different cities.

They also sent a special mailing of all watch-party locations to all the football parents so they could have the opportunity to watch the game, Frieling said.

Mross said it is common for K-State fans visiting Dallas for business or privilege to show up at their watch parties. She said they usually have a core group every year attending the parties, but the ages vary from recent graduates to older graduates.

The Kansas State Texans even have one fan who thinks he is Willie the Wildcat and does the K-S-U body cheer after each touchdown, Mross said.

"He's our Willie wannabe," she said.

Manhattan prepares for game

By KELLEE MILLER
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan will be the site of many football watch parties this weekend, because tickets for Saturday's K-State vs. Nebraska game are sold out.

This is the 233rd game Nebraska has sold out, and it has been sold out since February, said John Anderson, University of Nebraska director of ticket operations. This is Nebraska's final home game of the season.

Nebraska's Memorial Stadium seats 74,031, and Anderson said it is the third-largest city in Nebraska supposedly during game day. He said there are even bumper stickers that read, "Memorial Stadium: My Kind of Town."

K-State was allotted 4,000 tickets, which is standard procedure for the Big 12, K-State Athletic Ticket Manager Carol Adolph said. She said all tickets went to donors and season-ticket holders, and they have been sold out for a while. The ticket was $40.

Marcin Grusznis, junior in international business and marketing, is one K-State student who did get tickets. He said he bought four tickets for $35 each but didn't say how he had obtained them.

"I got them, and I am happy I got them," he said. "It's very, very lucky.

"We're bringing up plenty of banners and going to make sure our presence is known."

Monica Sanchez, who sells classified ads for the Daily Nebraskan, said there have been a lot of classified ads in the paper from people seeking tickets, and she mentioned one ad that is asking $125 for a ticket.

For those who didn't get tickets, the game will be broadcast on ABC at 2:30 p.m.

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said the association is taking the week off and isn't planning anything specific for the game. She said many of the bars in Aggieville will have watch parties this weekend.

Mike Arria, assistant bar manager at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, said all of its televisions will be tuned to the game. He said the business won't be as brisk this weekend because it is an away game, but he still is planning on a big night.

Greg Bollenbach, manager of Bobby T's Bar & Deli, said all seven of its televisions will be on the game, and they will be having drink and dinner specials.

"We're going to show the tape of last year's game starting at 1, and get 'em pumped," Bollenbach said. "It should be a good crowd.

"We'll look for volunteers to lead the K-S-U," he said.

The KSU Alumni Association also is sponsoring a pregame party in Lincoln. They sold out at 200 tickets last Friday, but Jody McGatlin, director of alumni programs, said this is one of the smallest pregame parties they have planned.

"I think for Nebraska a lot of people do their own thing," she said. "Parking is so tough, and some people want to get to the stadium early."

She said their largest party of the season drew 700 at the University of Texas game.

The pregame party will consist of a buffet, performance from the cheerleaders and a short program from someone from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics or the Alumni Association.

Nursing home explosion kills 5, injures 20 more

BY JOSEPH ALTMAN JR.
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

FLINT, Mich. — Three backhoes dug through discarded wheelchairs, beds and mounds of twisted metal Thursday to help rescuers look for signs of life in a nursing home where five people were killed and more than 20 injured in a fire.

The boiler in the basement of the Clara Barton Convalescence Center exploded just before 9 p.m. Wednesday, blowing out windows and collapsing the ceiling.

Firefighters and neighbors scrambled to pull dazed survivors out of the flaming building. Many residents were confused and clothed only in hospital gowns as they were taken into the rain and cold.

About 110 people, including 94 residents, were inside the home at the time of the explosion. Two employees and three residents were killed.

"It is almost miraculous that the fatality count is not higher," Mayor Woodrow Stanley said.

Searchers used police dogs trained to look for victims trapped beneath rubble but didn't find anyone.

At least six residential units were above the explosion site. A laundry room, kitchen and office adjoined the boiler in the basement.

The explosion blew out one side of the home, which was built in 1964. It shattered windows and left pieces of twisted roofing metal hanging in nearby trees.

Michael Townsend, 26, was at Divine Grace Ministries church next to the home when the explosion nearly knocked him out of his chair. He looked outside and saw flames towering above the building.

"We just started getting people out of there," Townsend said. "We went through the wing pulling out wheelchairs or just pulling out beds."

Federal and state officials were investigating the cause.

The nursing home has a history of citations for safety violations related to patient care, but the boilers passed their last inspection in December, said Kathy Wilbur, the director of the Michigan Department of Consumer and Industry Services.

Researchers find fossils of new dinosaur

BY PAUL RECER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Fossils of a long-necked, long-tailed, plant-eating dinosaur found in Africa suggest the animal was more primitive than similar creatures that lived in North America, researchers report.

The fossils, discovered in a rock formation in Niger, are of a primitive 20-ton animal that was more than 70 feet long.

A team led by Paul Sereno of the University of Chicago excavated tons of bone and rock and then spent two years cleaning and assembling the specimen. A report on the find appears today in the journal Science and an assembly of the fossils is on display at the National Geographic Society headquarters.

The previously unknown dinosaur has been named Jobaria tiguidensis, and researchers believe it lived about 135 million years ago at a time when the Sahara Desert was a lush forest with broad rivers.

Jobaria resembles the Apatosaurus, a sauropod that roamed North America around the same time. But Jobaria has a primitive, simple bone structure, suggesting that the animal represents a less-evolved form of sauropod.

"It is kind of like a relic," said David Varricchio of Montana State University. "It looks like it should have existed 40 million years before it did."

Varricchio is one of 11 co-authors of the dinosaur study.

Jeff Wilson of the University of Michigan, another co-author, said Jobaria was a real survivor that seemed to have evolved at a slower pace.

"Some dinosaurs change a lot in a short amount of time, whereas others — like Jobaria — change very little over millions of years," Wilson said.

The fact that Jobaria's feet are set close together under its body suggests that it could move gracefully, considering its size, Soreno said in a statement.

"Its proportions were elephant-like, and its bones could have supported its body mass when rearing during feeding or in courtship contests," Soreno said.

Car bomb kills 8 in Colombia; blast country's worst in years

BY JARED KOTLER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOGOTA, Colombia — Reviving memories of a bloody era when drug lords sowed terror to avoid extradition to the United States, a car bomb ripped through a Bogota commercial district Thursday, killing at least eight people and injuring 45.

Within hours, President Andres Pastrana defiantly signed extradition orders for three suspected drug traffickers.

The shrapnel-packed bomb, placed in a red Mazda sedan and believed detonated by remote control, destroyed a two-story house and a restaurant on a wide avenue and blew out the windows of banks, stores and apartment buildings nearly a quarter mile away.

It was the Colombian capital's worst blast since the wave of terror by the Medellin cocaine cartel in the late 1980s and early 1990s aimed at stopping the extradition of its members to the United States. The campaign only ended with the cartel's 1993 demise.

The new attack came a day after the Supreme Court approved the second handover in a week of a alleged drug trafficker to the United States — and Colombians feared it was a blunt warning to the government not to go ahead with more than three dozen planned extraditions.

"You get the feeling the wolf is raising its ears again," said Miguel Maza, a former head of the state security agency. Maza headed the agency in 1989, when a bomb placed by traffickers leveled its headquarters, killing 80 employees in the single most devastating attack of the era.

Colombia is the world's No. 1 cocaine exporter and a growing heroin supplier. U.S. officials have pressured authorities here to extradite drug kingpins for trial in U.S. courtrooms, where they face much stiffer sentences than in Colombia.

This violent country's leaders traditionally have been loath to do so, and there has not been an extradition for nine years.

Pastrana pledged to resume handovers after his election last year, hoping for U.S. support in confronting the illegal drug trade and leftist rebels.

In Washington, D.C., National Security Council spokesman Mike Hammer said, "We condemn violent acts such as this latest incident in Colombia."

Justice Minister Romulo Gonzalez said it was still too early to blame narcoterrorism for the 10:15 a.m. blast — which sent shards of metal and glass in all directions. Six people died on the scene, two others at hospitals, and 14 people were hospitalized in serious condition, said city health official Dr. Adriana Ortegon.

A badly burned and bleeding woman was pulled from beneath the skeleton of a parked car thrown by the blast. Another woman was found face up on the sidewalk in a pool of blood. A taxi driver who survived the explosion sat shell-shocked in his badly damaged vehicle, his face bloodied, a few feet from ground zero.

Martha di Iannini had just walked into her luxury furniture store when the bomb went off 50 feet away. It blew open the store's front window and flipped over furniture.

"It was a frightening explosion," she said.

The bomb, made of an estimated 150 pounds of explosives, left a 3-foot deep crater in the sidewalk along the upscale Pepe Sierra Avenue. Sirens wailed and helicopters circled overhead as bomb squad technicians scoured a wide area for clues.

Maza, the former security chief, said the bombing was identical to many of the indiscriminate attacks — in schools, at shopping centers and in public squares — that terrorized Colombia before the 1993 death of Medellin cartel boss Pablo Escobar ended the violent campaign.

Colombians will not be intimidated by acts of violence, a shaken Bogota Mayor Enrique Penalosa said.

The presidential decrees signed Thursday order alleged Venezuelan cocaine trafficker Fernando Jose Flores, Colombian heroin suspect Jaime Orlando Lara and Cuban national Sergio Bravilo Gonzales to be the first of 42 jailed alleged drug bosses extradited to stand trial before U.S. courts. The orders do not say when the three would be shipped out of Colombia.

"Innocent people always pay the price for extradition," said Jason Grisales, 25, a waiter at a hamburger restaurant on the same block as Thursday's blast.

Flores is believed by U.S. prosecutors to have evidence they need to build an extradition case against two powerful drug bosses, jailed former Cali cartel leaders Miguel and Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela.

Also facing possible extradition is Fabio Ochoa, a former Medellin cartel leader arrested Oct. 13 along with 29 other Colombians. Ochoa faces a U.S. indictment for his alleged role in a smuggling empire said to have exported as much as 30 tons of cocaine a month.

Colombia halted extraditions in 1991 but moved to allow them in December 1997 because of intense U.S. pressure.

"Innocent people always pay the price for extradition," said Jason Grisales, 25, a waiter at a hamburger restaurant on the same block as Thursday's blast.

Though rarely targeted at the civilian population, bombings have occurred periodically in recent months throughout Colombia, a country mired in a nearly 40-year-old guerrilla conflict. Banks, police stations and army posts are attacked frequently.

Survey finds more women as executives

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — More and more women are breaking into the top ranks of corporate America, but they seriously are underrepresented in mid-management jobs that lead to promotions, said a survey released Thursday.

The survey by the women's research group Catalyst showed that women who are black, Asian-American and Hispanic hold 1.3 percent of the executive positions in the nation's largest companies.

They appear to be making steady progress in the headquarters of Fortune 500 companies, both in rank and compensation, since figures were first compiled in 1995, the New York group said.

About 11.9 percent of 11,681 corporate officers in America's top-500 companies are women, up from 11.2 percent last year and 8.7 percent five years ago, according to government statistics confirmed by the companies, Catalyst said.

Meanwhile, 3.3 percent of companies' top earners — measured in salaries, bonuses and annual stock options — are women, compared with 2.7 percent last year and 1.2 percent in 1995.

"The numbers are small, but along every dimension ... they're moving in the right direction, and that's important," Catalyst president Sheila Wellington said.

Graves' budget proposal meets opposition from Democratic party

BY TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gov. Bill Graves' proposal of a 1-percent across-the-board spending cut in the Kansas budget was met with strong Democratic opposition and still is being debated.

GRAVES

House Democratic Leader Jim Garner sent a letter to the governor saying his decision was a needless impediment to Kansans trying to improve their quality of life. He called on the governor to set priorities based on Kansas values and argued that a 1-percent budget cut does not reflect values.

"I have a real problem with across-the-board cuts," Garner said. "There is no budgeting on priorities. We need to take a look at what's essential and what's not."

Of the proposed $45 million budget cut, more than half of the total would come from the education budget. The state Department of Education has not enjoyed an increase during good years, Garner said; it gets cut when years are tight.

"We need to target cuts in certain areas less essential," Garner said. "There's a smarter way to get those cuts."

Duane Goossen, director of the budget, reviews the budget for the fiscal year. Including next fiscal year, about $200 million will be cut out of the budget, with about $45 million being cut in this year's budget.

Next year's budget cut will not be across the board, Goossen said. The cuts will be targeted to certain agencies.

"The 1 percent is just a start for what we need to do next year," Goossen said. "We would have to cut $200 million next year if nothing was done, if we didn't cut $45 million today. It's the best way to go about it right now."

Don Brown, press secretary for the governor, said given the nature and timeframe of the budget, which ends June 30, 2000, the 1-percent budget cut was the best option available.

"Each agency has the ability on each budget to garner that 1-percent cut where they see fit," Brown said. "This gives the agencies time to make adjustments."

The Kansas Legislature does not convene until the second week in January. Garner, however, has requested the governor call the Legislature into a special session to come to a consensus on the budget.

Departments are not making the same sacrifice, Garner said. The Department of Commerce will suffer a $22,000 cut, which is not even close to the $24 million cut education will receive, he said.

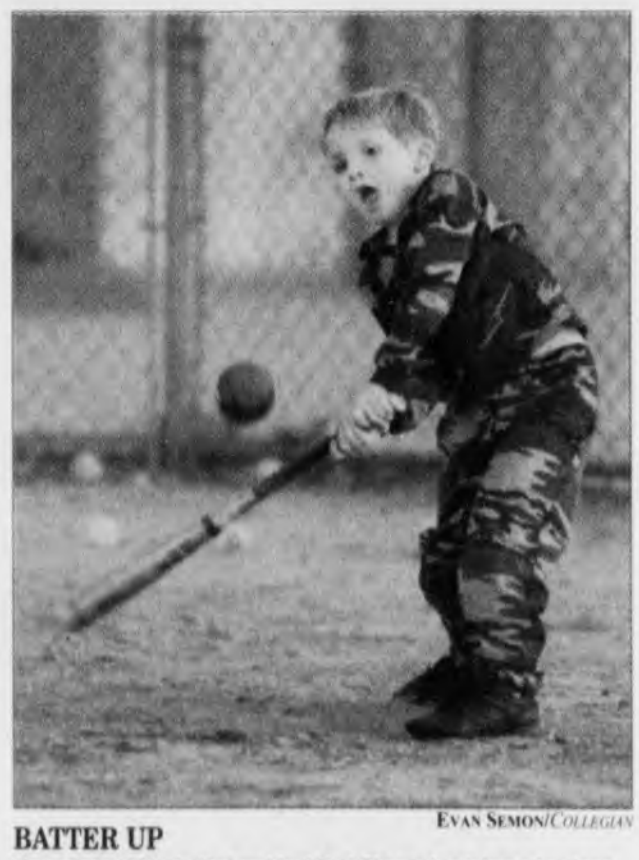
Calling a special session would be a drastic measure, Brown said, and financing it would be another cost to the taxpayers. They will discuss the budget proposal when the Legislature convenes in January. That will give the Legislature enough time to research their proposals, Brown said.

Speaker of the House Robin Jennison, R-Healy, said the governor has taken appropriate action.

"Government revenues are down, and we need to make some adjustments," Jennison said. "In the final analysis, there will be some targeted cuts."

Much of the problem could have been averted in the 1998 economic boom, Garner said.

A proposal made by the Democratic party would have used $68 billion to $80 million to take care of debts last year. If Kansas had pursued that agenda, we wouldn't be in the budget crunch we are in right now, Garner said.



"He's just wrong," Jennison said in reply to Garner. "The government doesn't stockpile a bunch of money. The government either spends the money or gives it back to the taxpayer."

But for K-State Faculty Senate Marion Gray, there might have been too many tax cuts the past two to three years, which might affect the flow of money to K-State if universities are included in the bill.

"The faculty are distressed. Our salaries are way below our peers," said Gray, professor of history. "We had hoped to narrow that gap. If the money's not here this year, then it won't be here at all."

Gray said he attributes the budget cut to irresponsibility.

"Clearly, our government leaders didn't plan right," he said.

Study finds HIV might hide in inactive white blood cells

BY PAUL RECER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A short time after it invades the body, the virus that causes AIDS creates a reservoir of silent infection that cannot be stamped out by current anti-viral drugs and might resist vaccines, a study shows.

The study, published today in the journal Science, sheds new light on how quickly HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, is able to establish a chronic, drug-resistant infection.

Earlier studies have shown that HIV establishes a reservoir of silent infection.

The new research shows that this disease pool is created almost immediately after the virus is transmitted.

"These chronically infected cells are important because they allow the virus to persist below the radar screen of the immune system, particularly at the time of the transmission," said Dr. Ashley T. Haase, an HIV researcher at the University of Minnesota and the senior author of the study.

Haase said the study shows that a short time after the sexual transmission of the AIDS virus, there is an infection established in what are known as resting T-cells.

These are white blood cells that are not participating actively in the body's immune response to the virus and are resistant to anti-viral drugs.

The finding is contrary to the belief that HIV first infects two other targets, macrophages and dendritic cells, and then spreads to active T-cells.

Instead, Haase said, the virus quickly moves in about equal proportions into both the resting and the active T-cells.

Dr. Tony Fauci, director of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases at the National Institutes of Health, said the Haase study was a nice piece of work that gives important new insight into the early stages of HIV infection.

By quickly infecting the resting T-cells, Fauci said, the virus gives itself some insurance of survival. A virus in resting T-cells is a much more difficult target for both the immune system and for anti-viral drugs, he said.

Fauci said the finding also is bad news for vaccines because it makes it more difficult to inoculate the body against HIV infection.

In the study, Haase and his colleagues first studied the step-by-step progress of AIDS virus infection in monkeys. The animals were infected vaginally with SIV, the simian form of HIV.

Fraternity to commemorate anniversary over weekend

The Sigma Chi fraternity celebrates its 50th anniversary this weekend with reunions and tours.

Several events are planned, and the weekend will be an opportunity for past and present members of the fraternity to interact, share memories and think of days gone by.

Jack Marker, chairman for the 50th anniversary festivities, said it is a momentous occasion.

"When the event happens, it will be a chance for me to sit back and watch other guys interact with people they haven't seen for years," Marker said.

He said it will be an opportunity for the campus to celebrate the past.

"It is nice to have a reunion," Marker said. "It tells everybody that the fraternity has been around for 50 years. That is 50 years of being a key part of K-State's environment and social environment."

The festivities begin this morning with a rundown of the initiation process, which originally took place Dec. 2 and Dec. 3, 1949. The initiation will take place in downtown Manhattan at the Harris Activity Center. The center was the original home of the initiation.

Marker said the reunion was moved up a couple of weeks to avoid poor weather, and he is pleased with the expected weather.

"We could not have asked for a weekend this nice," Marker said.

The events also include campus and city tours Saturday morning

Also scheduled is a formal banquet Saturday evening. Marker said he has 313 alumni coming in for the event, and he expects a large walk-up crowd.

"I would expect a bunch of guys to show up at the last minute," Marker said. "I told them to prepare for 450 people."

Beat NU!!

If you plan on drinking alcohol while watching KSU beat Nebraska, consider:

- Most* K-State students drink about one drink per hour or less when they party.
- It takes about one hour per drink to "clear" alcohol from the body.
- Most* KSU students drink five or fewer drinks when they party.
- Most* KSU students do not drink and drive.
- Eat before or while drinking.

Project WELLNESS Kansas State University

Most* K-State Students drink moderately if at all.

1 drink = one bottle of beer, one glass of wine, one wine cooler, or one shot of liquor

*Based on a 1999 campus-wide survey of 1,297 KSU students that was representative of the K-State student population with regard to demographics such as age, GPA, college, class and gender.

Championship hopes disappear in sea of red

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER

LINCOLN, Neb. — Coaches hate turnovers and missed opportunities.

In No. 9 K-State's 41-15 loss to the No. 4 Nebraska Cornhuskers on Saturday night, there were a lot of both.

K-State (9-1, 6-1) lost four fumbles, threw one interception, had one field goal and two punts blocked, and as far missed opportunities, of the Huskers' 10 fumbles, just three found their way into the hands of the Wildcats. But that just touches the tip of many chances the Cats had to win the game.

"We weren't very good, very good at all, probably in a lot of phases of the game," head coach Bill Snyder said. "It's pretty obvious. We turned the ball over too many times. We lost four turnovers, two blocked punts. Now I don't know many points that turned into, but that's a whole bunch of points that we provided for Nebraska.

"They played awfully well too, with the exception that they turned the ball over, too. Our turnovers seemed to be a little bit more costly."

The Huskers (9-1, 6-1) were led by sophomore quarterback Eric Crouch, who ran 27 times for a career-high 158 yards and two touchdowns, while passing for an additional 69 yards. His play accounted for 227 of the team-total 378 yards. Crouch literally ran all over, around and through K-State's No. 2 nationally ranked defense in the first half for 124 yards, which in turn gave the Huskers a 24-9 halftime lead, the first of the season from which the Cats haven't been able to rebound.

"I was happy with the defense in the second half," senior linebacker Mark Simoneau said. "We gave up one big running play really, and besides that we played really well, so I'm real proud of the guys on how hard they played in the second half."

On the first play of the game, the Huskers' running back Dan Alexander fumbled and senior safety Lamar Chapman recovered the ball on Nebraska 28-yard line. Three offensive plays later, Jamie Rheem's 40-yard field goal attempt was blocked by Husker Kyle Vanden Bosch.

Those early turn of events seemed to set the tone for the rest of the game. Any time the Cats had the opportunity to make the play, the No. 4 Husker defense

K-State, other universities face off in recycling competition this week

By COURTNEY DUFFIELD
Kansas State Collegian

K-State has challenged several colleges and universities to a recycling competition this week in conjunction with America Recycles Day.

The contest to collect the most aluminum cans will take place today through Saturday.

Stacy Meredith, senior in geography and political science, said she and student body president Jason Heinrich came up with the idea two years ago as a fun way to help the environment and promote awareness of recycling.

HEINRICH

"Jason Heinrich and I were the ones that challenged the universities," Meredith said.

Meredith said the universities participating are the University of Nebraska, the University of Kansas, the University of Kansas Medical Center, Bethel College, Pittsburgh State University and Colby Community College.

This is the second year for the contest. Bethel College won last year.

"It was exciting," Meredith said. "We were surprised because it was

Windfall could help fund state schools

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Money from a $475 million windfall at the state's transportation department could be used to shore up the state's schools and universities, a lawmaker says.

State Rep. Phill Kline, R-Shawnee, said the money could help state education absorb upcoming treasury shortfalls that are expected to top $150 million.

Department of Transportation Secretary Dean Carlson calls Kline's plan foolish and said such a windfall doesn't exist.

Kline, however, cites a Nov. 5 memo from the Legislative Research Department that identified $475 million in unexpected revenue in the highway program, including $185 million in state funds, $273 million in federal and local money, and $16 million from interest earned on the deposit of bond proceeds.

The memo said those numbers are based on the difference between what KDOT projected in cash flow back in April and revised projections from September.

The memo said the $185 million in extra state money is from a higher-than-expected cash carryover in the highway fund at the end of the 1999 fiscal year. The $16 million in interest would come from selling the state's new highway bonds earlier than projected.

Carlson said the figures outlined in the memo are part of a 10-year agency budget and are based only on current projections.

"Representative Phill Kline is obviously at it again, misrepresenting the facts to make money magically appear out of nowhere," he said. "He proposes

Georgia family puts Hitler's silver pieces up for auction

ATLANTA — Silver pieces believed to have been owned by Adolf Hitler — including lobster forks, ice-cream spoons and a cigarette box — are being auctioned on the Internet by a Georgia family. One Jewish group is hoping no one buys them.

Jay Kaiman, southeast director for the Anti-Defamation League, said his Atlanta office has received calls from people upset over the auction.

"We think it would be perverse if an individual bought a fork or a setting and invited people over so they can show them their Hitler plates or cigarette box," he said. "We're concerned that they are mass merchandising Hitler in a pop-culture way."

Atlanta-based Great Gatsby's is conducting the auction, which was set to begin Friday night and continue until Thursday.

The auction house's manager, Maxine Hyland, said there have been few complaints about the Hitler items, which were among hundreds of items available in Gatsby's first on-line auction.

Other items include four original works by Pablo Picasso, a Rolls Royce owned by Bee Gees member Barry Gibbs and the original 16-mm master print of the Beatles movie "Let It Be."

Antimissile program remains behind schedule, report says

WASHINGTON, D.C. — An independent panel says the Pentagon's development of an antimissile system continues to be hampered by inadequate testing, shortages of spare parts and management mistakes, The Washington Post reported.

The 40-page report, forwarded to Congress by the Defense Department last week, said research and development delays have compressed the program's schedule against politically imposed deadline. It recommended that if further delays occur, President Clinton should postpone a scheduled decision next summer whether to build the system, the newspaper said in Sunday editions.

The project, a scaled-back version of the "Star Wars" program advocated in the 1980s by President Reagan, would erect a shield against ballistic missile attacks on U.S. territory at a multibillion-dollar cost.

The panel's criticisms and cautions resembled those that it noted in a report in early 1998.

Since then, the Pentagon has extended the projected deployment date from 2003 to 2005, scheduled additional testing and hired the Boeing Co. to coordinate development efforts.

KCPL faced with pressure to decline deal

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — With shareholders of both companies growing increasingly restless, talk is growing about trouble with the deal to merge Western Resources with Kansas City Power & Light Co.

KCPL is under mounting pressure not only to reconsider but perhaps to abandon the deal, The Kansas City Star reported Sunday, citing sources close to the discussion.

The company's board of directors and management are weighing the merits of the deal, which has lost more than 20 percent of its value.

At issue is whether KCPL can move the merger forward and meet its obligation to best serve its shareholders.

If the merger had been completed last week, KCPL shareholders would have received less than 80 percent of what they expected when they approved the merger last year.

"I can't see how Kansas City Power & Light's directors can go through with this deal," said Steve Currall, associate professor of management at Rice University in Houston and a specialist in corporate governance.

Michel Philipp, a spokesman for Western Resources, said the deal still gives value to KCPL shareholders, including the benefit of being able to participate in a larger company after the merger closes.

KCPL, meanwhile, is saying little about its plans.

"We at KCP&L are observing and complying with the merger agreement," Kim Levetzow, KCPL spokeswoman, said. "We can't discuss any other details at this time."

There are other options for KCPL, such as asking Western to sweeten the offer, though Western has said that's not possible — at least not now.

KCPL also could stick with the merger after deciding that it's still the best deal in today's market.

Regardless of what happens, increasingly restive shareholders say they're ready for the three-year merger saga to end.

"I don't believe I'd vote for it again," said Richard Beechwood, who owns stock in both companies.

"It's just been too agonizing."

KCPL soon will have one, and probably two, opportunities to walk away from the merger without suffering penalties.

Local protesters object to showing of new film 'Dogma'

BY JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Protesters gathered outside of Seth Childs Cinemas on Sunday afternoon to object to the showing of "Dogma."

"It attacks my religion," protester Tom Toenjes said. "I wouldn't attack anyone else's religion — why would they attack mine? If they have the freedom to attack my belief then I have the freedom to attack others."

"Dogma" stars Matt Damon and Ben Affleck as two fallen angels plotting to get back into heaven. God is played by Alanis Morissette, and Chris Rock plays Rufus, the 13th apostle.

Toenjes brought his family to the protest, including 14-year-old Joan Toenjes.

"It blasphemes the Catholic faith," she said. "We've heard about the things they do and they are really bad. Like, they say God is a woman."

Bruce Petitt came to see "Dogma" because of the attention brought to the movie by the protesters.

"I though if it was worth protesting, it was worth seeing," Petitt said.

Dianne Redler, freshman in open-option, said she protested the movie because it denies the benefits God has given America.

"The way I see it, they are making fun of God, and that can't happen because he is so important to every part of life," Redler said. "It shows that America has turned away from God, and they are disregarding all blessings he has given to America.

"It takes huge risks to say the things they do and that type of speech should not be allowed," Redler said.

Frances Slobodnik of Rossville, Kan., said he protested because the movie denies the virginity of Mary and Joseph and it displays the apostles engaging in sexual, immoral acts, and it makes fun of the Catholic hierarchy and Mass.

"I believe deeply held convictions should not be made fun of just to make fun of something," Slobodnik said.

He said the movie "Stigmata," which was released earlier this fall, was also bad, but "Dogma" satirizes many specific aspects of the Catholic faith.

"It attacks a wide range of our beliefs," Slobodnik said.

Veronica Sama and her daughter, Mary Sama, of Manhattan, came to the protest for Jesus and Mary.

"We have been protected and taken care of by Jesus and Mary," Veronica Sama said. "They've protected and comforted us when things were going badly. They have provided for all our needs. We've had many miracles."

The protesters do not feel they are promoting the movie by bringing more attention to it, Mary Haug of Hiawatha, Kan., said.

"We are bringing attention to the movie, but not in a positive way," Haug said.

"We've been watching the ticket lines from here, and I know which lines haven't had a lot of people coming to them. I don't know which ones are for which movie, but I'll find out before I leave.

"Blasphemy means mocking God — slapping God in the face," Haug said. "If you were to mock and slap your father in the face, would he stand quietly or turn around and slap you in the butt?"

Seth Childs Cinemas officials declined to comment on whether the protesters were affecting ticket sales.

Jon Novak said he came to see "Dogma" after noticing the protesters Sunday afternoon.

"I haven't even seen the previews, but they were out there protesting and I decided to come see it."

'Dogma' protest serves only to attract viewers

Someone needs to tell the Catholic League and other protesters that the objective in protesting and boycotting a product is to hurt that product's economic success.

When the result of a protest does just the opposite, the protest is a failure.

Such will be the case with the protest of "Dogma," a movie directed by independent filmmaker Kevin Smith.

The movie, which stars Matt Damon and Ben Affleck, was filmed, edited and ready for release almost a year ago. Executives at the major studios were reluctant to release the film, however, due to its controversial content, which includes Alanis Morissette as a boxer-short wearing, Skee-ball addicted God and Chris Rock as the 13th apostle, Rufus, who is angry about being left out of the Bible. The production company Lion's Gate, finally agreed to release the film, and now the company executives probably feel as if they hit the jackpot.

Fortunately for Lion's Gate, in the film industry all press is good press. The company's executives surely know nothing sells tickets like a little controversy. Protesters are serving that controversy to Lion's Gate on a silver platter.

Just Sunday afternoon, dozens of protesters crowded the outskirts of the Seth Childs Cinemas parking lot carrying signs that read, "Stop the blasphemy on Catholics." And probably everyone who passed considered seeing the movie just to figure out what about the film has people so upset.

Reviewers have suggested that those who see "Dogma" might be disappointed if they're expecting something truly inflammatory. CNN reviewers have warned that the movie isn't quite as controversial or outrageous as the hype would have people believe.

In the end, that won't matter. Whether the movie is truly blasphemous or controversial, the curious will have to see the film for themselves. That curiosity will translate into big bucks for the filmmaker and producers, which is the exact opposite of what protesters have in mind.

New video-game craze offers chance to escape mundane; parents should lighten up

VIEWPOINT

KEN WELLS

There's nothing like being on the leading edge of the next "big thing." If you've been hunkering over differential equations for one-too-many semesters, the cultural-ripple-turned-obsession called "Magic: The Gathering" is back with a vengeance, but this time, it's the multimedia collectible juggernaut in a cute, fluffy package called "Pokémon."

If you're either too sophisticated to acknowledge pop culture or are just utterly overwhelmed, "Pokémon" is originally a Japanese term — it was going to be called "Pocket Monsters" in America until someone clued into the possible double entendre.

The concept is simple, yet odd: There's 150-odd bizarre lil' critters running amok, each of whom have bizarre abilities, and the mission is to capture and train the creatures. Not to capture one Pokémon so that you may find emotional fulfillment with a beloved pet, but to catch them all, as the theme song chants: "Gotta catch 'em all!" It's a cross between Bill Gates and Animal Planet, and formerly was notorious for the episode in Japan with the strobing background that caused seizures in several children Who says kids don't exercise watching television?

Sadly, the "seizure" episode isn't going to be available in the United States, along with other episodes which feature characters cross-dressing and (gasp) using a gun. For a show like "Pokémon" with such a non-episodic, running plotline in which a missing episode equals confusion, this is troubling, especially considering they're concerned about content that "Looney Tunes" was founded upon.

Well, really popular computer games cross media borders quickly, so after the video game came the trading-card game, the poseable figures, party favors, key-chains, wallpaper, TV show, movie, intrauterine device, what have you. Instant cultural phenomenon, much more so than "Magic" in that the young audience is targeted perfectly in a variety of different media. (And "Magic" seems to be deader than that black cat that's been rotting in the street near the corner of 11th Street and Anderson Avenue.)

You can see this problem coming. Children living in an environment that is sustained for them (as opposed to "by them") can go from "interested" or "involved" to "obsessed" in 4.2 seconds. This is true if they're third-graders or seniors in residence halls on Daddy's checkbook.

The appeal of "Pokémon" to youth has so many levels. They're cute, they're collectible, they're combatable — you capture more Pokémon by fighting for them. It's like cockfighting, but with genetically-scrambled critters. It's also telling that there can't be satisfaction in settling down with Pikachu (it's a tennis ball with pipe cleaner limbs) and being content: You have to get them ALL (Imagine being driven to capture all the rabbits on Earth ... Why? Unless you own a boa constrictor, there's nothing to do with 'em).

Parents don't seem to be fretting over the underlying theme of establishing a cartoon monster monopoly. Some are worried that their children are living in a fantasy world. As Christian News columnist Berit Kjos put it, "Now, I realize that there are positive elements such as learning math, learning economics, team spirit, learning to train and be patient with your Pokémon. But all of these are part of a fantasy. That takes the place of reality for many of these students and children, and it does separate them from parents in ways I don't believe are healthy."

With all due respect: Bite me.

I'm not big on "Pokémon," not the card game nor the toys nor the cartoon. But there's an underlying tension in this country, with parents worrying about some Evil Force seizing their children's souls in the night. Whether it's video games like "Doom" or Harry Potter books or "Pokémon," anything a child spends too much time with gets scrutinized by parents who don't want their children to grow up and mow down their recess class with an assault rifle. It's not a problem to saturate children in the implicit sexuality of the Backstreet Boys (or any of those interchangeable dancing boys) or Britney Spears and her inflatable anatomy, but we draw the line at animated Japanese demon-critters? C'mon.

TED HOPKINS/COLLEGIAN

Sometimes children don't want to spend 24-7 in reality, and can you blame them? Let them have their escapes. If you think it's unhealthy for a child to obsess excessively about fictionalized creatures battling it out on television, reflect on the National Football League for a second. Children aren't supposed to be anchored to reality in the same way that us cubicle-rats are. But if the child in question starts stuffing housecats into fishbowls chanting "Gotta catch 'em all!" then maybe it's time for the fruit-flavored chewable Prozac.

The media-hyped crimes already have begun. A 13-year-old child got knifed in the leg during a less-than-civil Pokémon scuffle, allegedly by a 9-year-old. You'll hear more about this particular child-on-child attack than you will about any of the others that happened in the country last week, if only because it's what the news media wants you to hear. You'd think the rest of America's students all sniffed daisies and fingerpainted in harmony. Remember the days when children shot each other over shoes? Nobody made you go to school barefoot (unless your parents were just malicious).

The interesting point about this particular cultural phenomenon is that "Pokémon," for its exotic and mystifying nature, isn't unnaturally dangerous. It's not a phenomenon that needs to be snuffed out (like those Dick Edwards commercials). It's not an attempt to subvert the world's children. It's a manifestation of the world we live in, and if a family starts having a problem with "Pokémon," I humbly suggest that perhaps the problem lies in the family's interaction with that culture — if you're going to fight with "Pokémon," you'll probably wrestle with the morality of bubble bath.

Even if you're not all about "Pokémon," it's fun to watch right about now, from a cultural standpoint. The marketing madness is amusing if you don't feel the impulse to buy it all. The workers at Burger King were too busy fretting over Jigglypuffs and Charmanders to notice they gave me a Hershey's sundae pie and not a strawberry cheesecake (grumble snarl hiss spit). Movie theaters are running out of trading cards promised to movie attendees and some patrons are getting steamed. Collectors are losing their minds.

Unquestioned support for minimum-wage increase unfair to employers

GUEST VIEWPOINT

ROBERT TRACINSKI

Suppose a politician suggested the following measure: The politician explains the current labor shortage is putting a strain on businesses, who now have to pay higher wages to keep their workers. In order to help those businesses, the politician concludes, we need to impose government-mandated wage caps; he calls this proposal a maximum wage.

If any politician dared to propose such a plan, everyone would be up in arms, and justly so. People would denounce the plan as an attempt to turn workers into slaves by depriving them of the right to negotiate for the wages they consider acceptable. Why should the rights of workers be sacrificed to meet the needs of businesspeople?

Notice, however, the completely opposite response to current proposed increases in the minimum wage, or the so-called living wage — an even higher minimum wage imposed by some city governments. When it is a matter of sacrificing the businessperson to the workers, when it is a matter of abrogating the businessperson's right to negotiate on wages, when it is a matter of treating the businessperson as a slave to the needs of others, no one dares to offer any moral opposition.

There are many practical objections to these living-wage plans. For example, higher-minimum-wage plans will cause higher unemployment. More importantly, however, why is there no concern for the rights of employers?

Employers, like the rest of us, have to make decisions about what they can afford. They have to decide how many workers they need to hire and how much they can afford to pay them. They base these decisions on how much value employees bring to the company. If their work creates more than $10 per hour worth of value, for example, an employer will be willing to pay them that much. If their labor is not that productive, then hiring those employees at that wage would require the employer to operate at a loss.

Yet, that is precisely what wage-law advocates demand. In some cities and states, they want to mandate, by government edict, an increase in the minimum wage from $5.75 per hour (California's minimum wage) to as much as $10 per hour or above, and they expect the employers to pay these wages by operating at a loss.

In your own life this would be the equivalent of the government arbitrarily doubling the prices you have to pay for a car, for rent, for food or for any other necessity. That would be considered monstrous if it were done to a regular person, but not if it is done to an employer.

Employers, in the eyes of wage-law advocates, are different from regular people; they have no right to decide how they will spend their own money, and no right to decide what their workers' labor is worth to them. Why don't businesspeople have a right to do these things? Because they are making money.

Activists complain the current economic boom is not being shared by everyone. While businesspeople are making money, some workers are barely getting by. So their needs trump their employers' rights.

These workers, of course, are free to negotiate for higher wages, but to do so without government intervention, they would have to convince their employers they are worth it by acquiring new skills. This would be a two-way trade: to get more money from their employers, they would have to offer more value in return.

The advocates of wage laws don't want a two-way trade. In their view, workers should not be required to earn a higher wage; instead, the workers need only assert their needs and their employer therefore must be forced by the government to provide for those needs.

To these activists, employers are not people with rights. Businesspeople enter into the calculations only in the way a bank enters into the calculation of a felon who has stolen its money: they're where the money is.

Lots of money is being made in this good economy. The businesspeople have most of it. So living-wage activists think, let's go grab it. The idea that this money belongs to someone who has a right to decide how to spend it never occurs to them.

This assault on individual rights should be condemned. If we recognize the rights of workers to negotiate for higher wages, we must also recognize the employers' rights to negotiate. To do otherwise is to make employers second-class citizens, forcing them into involuntary servitude to their workers.

Minorities should not ask for specialty Senate seats

Editor,

In the Collegian article "BSU, Senate discuss adding minority seats," many solutions were presented about resolving the problem of a lack of minority representatives in the Student Goverining Association and Senate.

One such solution, advocated by Black Student Union, is to open six seats to minorities. Also mentioned is that if the Student Senate does not receive the representation BSU desires, they'll "push that idea through."

While these ideas can be taken a number of ways, and may be beneficial in establishing K-State as a diverse university, this discriminates against the majority.

Shouldn't those in the minority on campus have to work just as hard as anyone else to gain a seat on Senate or SGA?

Simply because someone is in a minority does not instill them with special privileges.

Now, I am by no means racist, but if someone wants to try run for Senate or a position in SGA, what is stopping them?

Simply because they only feel comfortable with others like them, whether they be minorities or otherwise, does not mean they cannot run.

Most certainly, if anyone wishes to achieve a larger number of minorities represented in any organization, go out and talk to your target audience. There is no need to reserve a place for them.

Minorities are just as capable of joining an office as anyone else and should have to work just as hard as anyone else to achieve a position in that office.

Thank you.

Residents of Junction City not 2nd class, reader says

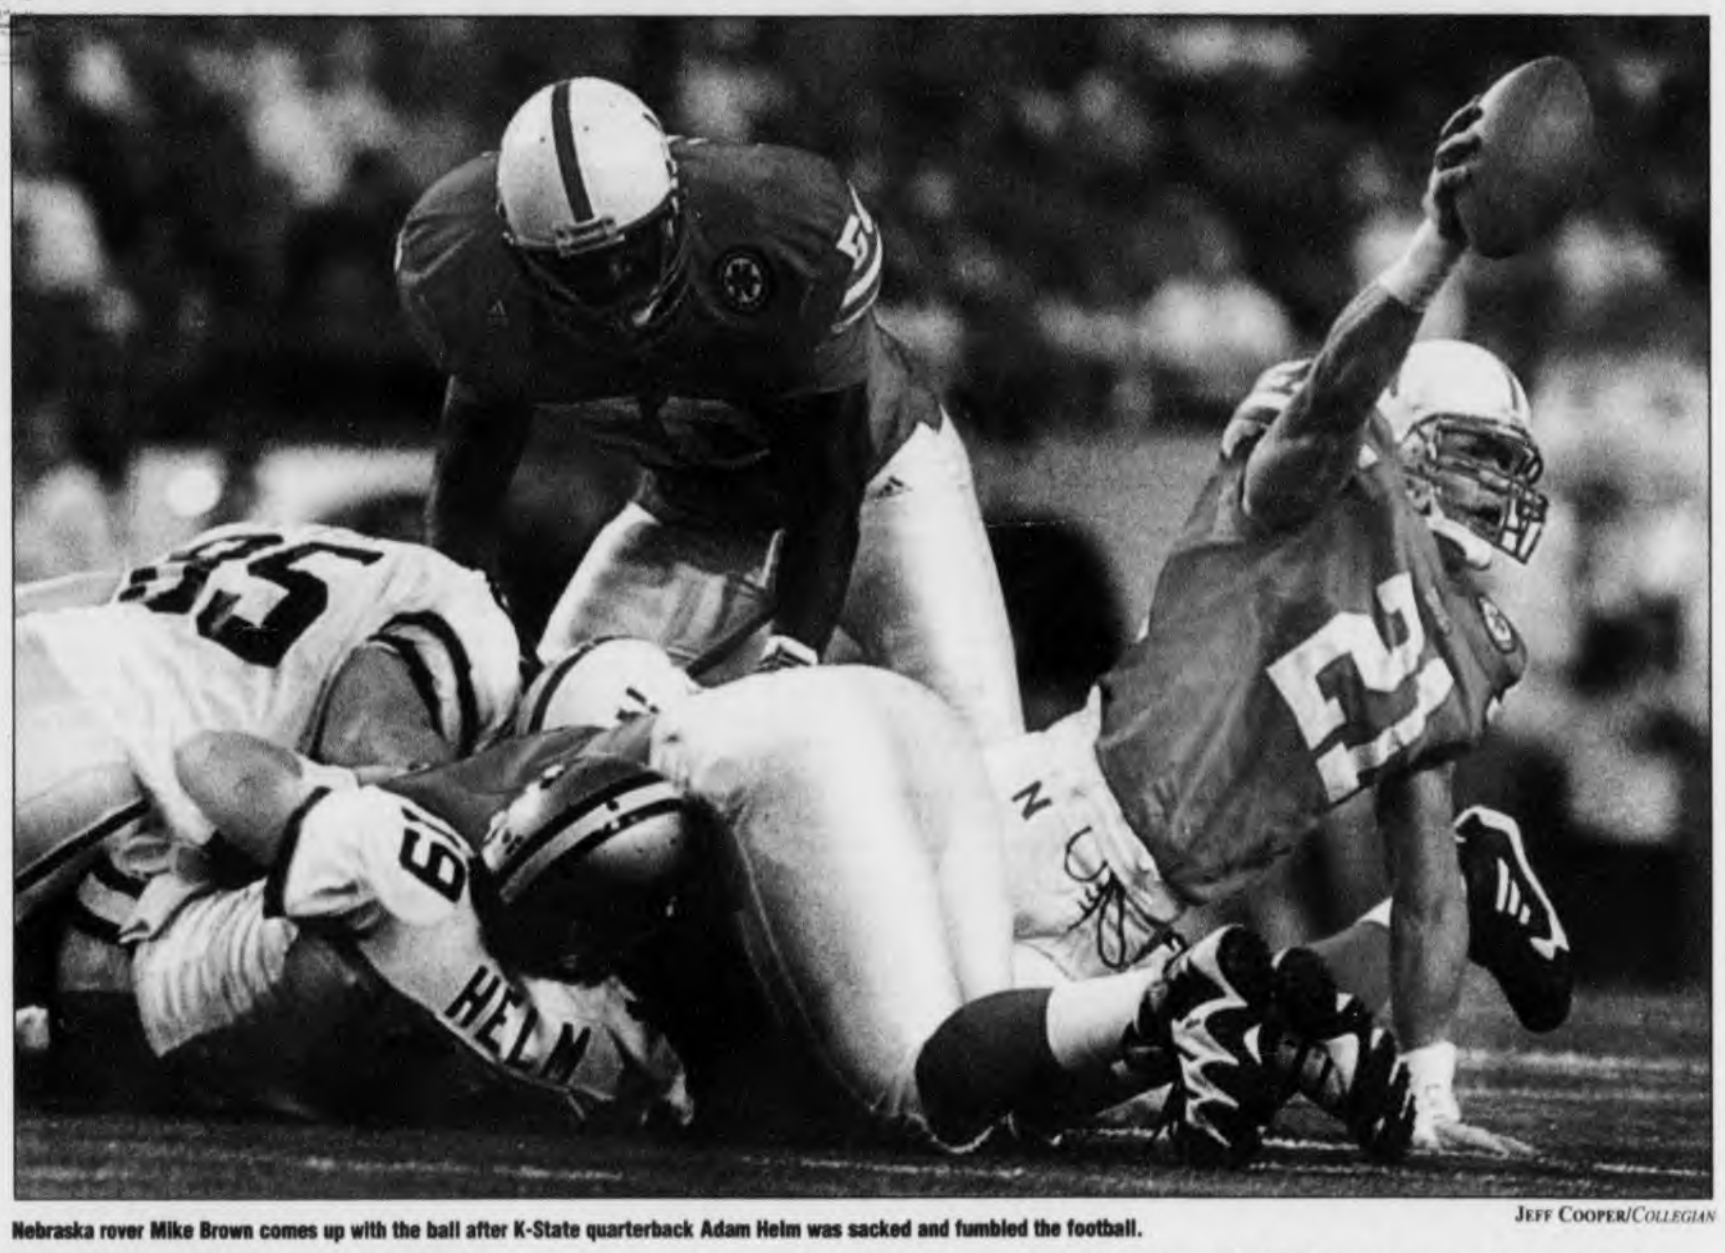
Editor,

I really take offense to Travis Lenker's column in Thursday's Collegian.

He wrote, "Since this store of all stores soon will make its debut in Manhattan, what better time than the present for our local religious leaders to stop bawling about the loss of the Ten Commandments monolith and work on getting Manhattan Town Center to move those satin Victoria's Secret sales hussies back to Junction City where they belong?"

Does he not know that people, just like the people who live in Manhattan, live in Junction City?

For years we have been looked down on by the citizens of Manhattan as second-class citizens.



I would hope that the younger generation would be trying to put a stop to this stereotype. Has Lenkner ever been any farther in Junction City than Grant Avenue?

There are nice homes, businesses and families there just like in Manhattan.

I would appreciate someone talking to Lenkner about his stereotyping of Junction City residents.

A lot of my time, money and support goes to K-State being that I have a son there who wrote for the Collegian at one time, too.

simply would not allow it, either via K-State turnover or stuffing of the play. They kept the K-State running attack to just 92 yards of output and a minute 2.5 yards-per-carry average.

"That's the consistency factor," offensive coordinator and quarterback coach Ron Hudson said. "We're proud to be 9-1 right now. We came into the this game 9-0 with a rebuilding process, and the fact that that rebuilding process hasn't culminated yet is probably because of the some of the inexperience we have, and against a team like Nebraska, that can catch up to you.

"Give Nebraska some credit for stopping us," Hudson said. "There were some opportunities for us and we didn't capitalize, and that's the, difference. We beat Texas because we didn't turn the ball over — period. We turned the ball over here, and that's the difference."

Coupled with the Husker defensive effort, which yielded just 234 total yards from the K-State offense, is the lackluster play of junior quarterback Jonathan Beasley.

Throughout the season, Beasley has been inconsistent, compiling a less-than-stellar 45-percent completion percentage. But at times, Beasley has performed well, namely at Oklahoma State, when he passed for 311 yards and accounted for six touchdowns.

On Saturday, it would've taken a carbon-copy performance to have had success against the quick Nebraska defense.

With that in mind, his inconsistency was at its worst as he completed just three of 19 pass attempts for 100 yards, 55 of which came on one play to wide receiver Quincy Morgan.

"It's pretty obvious," Snyder said,"We're not setting the world on fire with the play out of our quarterbacks."

With just one regular season game remaining with the Missouri Tigers next week, Snyder said the goal at hand for the Cats is to regroup and not have a repeat performance of last season.

"Obviously that makes an impression on you," Snyder said. "These are young guys that haven't been in this position that many times. We were last December 5th, and that was the last time.

"I know that there is pain in our locker room, and there's pain with our players, and there's pain with our coaches, and that's to be expected. But we're still in our season, and we can't let happen to us what happened a year ago. We let that loss in St. Louis get us beat in San Antonio. I just don't want this football team to let this loss get us beat in Manhattan against the University of Missouri."

Offensive problems continue to plague Cats in Husker loss

BY NABIL SHAHEEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They say two heads are better than one. Unfortunately, for the Wildcats, the two-headed quarterback tandem of junior Jonathan Beasley and senior Adam Helm failed in the Wildcats' 41-15 loss to Nebraska on Saturday.

Offensive woes continued to taunt the Cats for the third week in a row as they struggled to move the ball.

Beasley started the game with an apparently injured shoulder. He practiced the running game throughout the week but was not able to take a snap.

"Jonathan is banged up pretty good," head coach Bill Snyder said. "He is having to take some injections before ball games. He's got a bad shoulder. He has played with that, which obviously had a great impact and effect on his throwing accuracy."

The injury came when Beasley was warming up against Baylor on Oct. 30.

"Jonathan had some problems just because he didn't throw a ball all week (at practice)," offensive coordinator and quarterbacks coach Ron Hudson said. "We tried to hang on. We tried to keep it quiet because of the shoulder, but it was obvious the effect of the

Volleyball team tops Missouri

■ Cats earn 12th-straight victory over Tigers, continue in mission for conference championship.

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State volleyball team remains in the hunt for the Big 12 Conference championship, due in part to its three-game sweep of the Missouri Tigers on Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

The No. 19 Wildcats defeated the Tigers 15-8, 15-7, and 15-6. With the win they are still alive in the conference, just one out of first. It was the 12th-consecutive win over the Tigers. Earlier in the season at Missouri, K-State won in three games as well.

In game one, a powerful Cat defense managed to set the tone for the night.

The Cats held the Tigers to a dismal .069 hitting percentage in the match, while K-State hit .268. The Cats outdug the Tigers 41-31. Both teams, however, were plagued with service errors. K-State (18-6, 12-4) had nine, while Missouri (9-18, 3-13) posted eight.

Senior outside hitter Dawn Cady led the Cats' offense with 18 kills and six digs on the night. She is the current conference leader leader with 5.50 kills per game. Sophomore outside hitter Liz Wegner added 12 kills and and six digs as well, while sophomore setter Disney Bronnenberg recorded 38 assists and seven digs.

K-State's next action is Wednesday when they travel to College Station, Texas, to meet up with the Texas A&M Aggies. The Cats are looking to sweep the season series after winning in four games earlier in the season at Bramlage Coliseum. Game time for the Aggies matchup is 7 p.m.

Cat women's cross country wins regional

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Make it two years in a row.

The No. 7 women's cross country team won its second consecutive NCAA Midwest Championship Saturday in Champaign, Ill., while the Wildcat men finished 12th.

K-State almost made it a clean sweep of the top finishers, as four of the top five were Cats.

The women were led by freshman Amy Mortimer, who was first in a field of 177 with a time of 16:59 in the 5,000-meter contest. Mortimer, the Big 12 Newcomer of the Year, also placed fourth at the conference championships Oct. 30.

"Amy's win is a great exclamation point to what has been a solid season," head coach Randy Cole said.

Also doing well on the women's side were All-American Korene Hinds, who finished second with a time of 16:59, and Annie Wetterhus, who finished third with a time of 17:14. Amanda Crouse capped off the women finishers for fourth with a time of 17:18.

"The women took care of business and ran a great team race," Cole said. "They were really patient until the end and fed off of each other. We have nothing to lose and everything to gain at Nationals."

The men finished in the upper half of the 31-team field, and Jean Paul Niyongabo turned in a top-10 mark with his seventh-place time of 31:05 in the 10,000-meter race.

Junior Brandon Jessop finished 24th with a time of 31:36 and joined Niyongabo as an all-region selection.

Two exhibition games. Two wins by an average of 24.5 points for the K-State women's basketball team.

Despite the victories, K-State head coach Deb Patterson still isn't satisfied with the play of her team after Sunday's 78-61 home victory against the Athletes In Action.

"I felt like relative to where we can be, today's effort was probably a five on a scale of 10, relative to the best I've seen this team perform," Patterson said.

Factoring heavily in that rating was the fact for 100 yards, 55 of which came on a second-quarter strike to wide receiver Quincy Morgan, Beasley was replaced by Helm with 4:53 left in the third quarter.

The move came after Beasley had missed a routine short pass to wide-open receiver Aaron Lockett.

"We were doing OK, we were hanging in there," Hudson said. "But when he missed that little easy loop out to Aaron Lockett, that really told the story."

Helm had four completions on 12 attempts for 46 yards. He also was sacked five times by the No. 4 defense in the land.

"I don't think there was any question that Kansas State struggled to move the ball," Nebraska head coach Frank Solich said. "That opens up a lot for you in terms of your team and your approach. The defense did a great job again."

Throughout the night, whether it meant watching the ball sail over their heads or watching it land short on the turf of Memorial Stadium, K-State's receivers were frustrated.

"We've had a number of times this year where we've had trouble as far as connecting from the quarterback/receiver standpoint," Lockett said. "It definitely got us in trouble today."

After counting on their defense all year to help win games, the Wildcats finally were tested on both sides of the ball.

"We were fortunate the first nine games to get through it depending on our defense and special teams," Lockett said. "But a team like Nebraska, that caliber, it was unfortunate we didn't complete those passes, and it definitely hurt us."

CROUCH

6-foot-1-inch sophomore engineered the Nebraska option offense, while passing for 69 yards, completing eight passes on 17 attempts.

"He got 150-some odd yards and that is pretty doggone good when you are a quarterback," K-State head coach Bill Snyder said. "He did a nice job. He does a very nice job executing their offense. I think their offense in total does a nice job in executing, other than the fact that they are turning the ball over some."

"He was able to run all over the field. We knew we had to stop him, and it just wasn't our day."

— Lamar Chapman, K-State free safety

Crouch's 158 yards rushing is the most any player has rushed against the Wildcats this season.

Darren Davis rushed for 151 yards in K-State's 35-28 win over the Cyclones.

Crouch led a Nebraska rushing attack that included eight runners totaling 309 yards — also the most any opponent has rushed against the Wildcats.

K-State free safety Lamar Chapman said Crouch's quickness and speed allowed him to elude K-State's defense.

"He was able to run all over the field," he said. "We knew we had to stop him and it just wasn't our day."

Crouch rushed for more than 100 yards for the second time this season and for the fourth time in his career.

His career-high 27 rushing attempts was a new Nebraska school record as he passed the 1,000 career rushing yard mark and became the 50th Husker to total 1,000 rushing yards.

Crouch's 1,153 career rushing yards ranks him at 42nd in the Husker record books.

"Eric was tremendous," Solich said. "He showed a great deal of athletic ability and a great deal of heart.

"For a quarterback to do something with the football as many times as he did in terms of the running game, and also be valuable to what we did in the passing game, is vital."

Crouch, who leads the Big 12 in passing efficiency at 149.22, completed only eight passes, but was able to expose K-State's secondary by using the tight end.

Crouch connected with tight end Tracey Wistrom on four pass plays for a combined total of 68 yards, including a 26-yard strike.

With Crouch at the top of his game, the Wildcat defense failed to get an interception, ending its streak of 17 games with a pick-off.

K-State defensive end Darren Howard said the Wildcats failed to adjust properly, allowing Crouch's targets to be wide open.

"We made a lot of mistakes that we didn't correct," Howard said. "You can't make mistakes against Nebraska. We adjusted wrong and the tight end killed us in the first quarter."

Crouch began his career day with just over seven minutes to go in the first quarter.

He rushed for quick gains of 9 and 5 yards before dashing through K-State's secondary for a 30-yard touchdown jaunt.

He scored his second touchdown run with 41 seconds to go in the first quarter. After Randy Stella blocked a K-State punt for a safety, Crouch started the Nebraska drive with passes of 26 and 14 yards to Wistrom.

Crouch's 158 yards rushing is the most any player has rushed against the Wildcats this season. Darren Davis rushed for 151 yards in K-State's 3-28 win over the Cyclones.

Nebraska stalled on six straight plays before Crouch slid through K-State's defensive line for an 18-yard touchdown.

"He is the best quarterback we have faced," K-State linebacker Ben Leber said of Crouch. "And we just had a lack of execution on our part. You will never see a team like Nebraska. They are just hard to figure out."

Crouch has rejuvenated a Husker offense that chalked up only 185 yards against Southern Mississippi and scored a season-low 20 points against Texas.

He is 6-1 as a starting quarterback and has thrown only three interceptions. He led the Huskers to a 37-0 shellacking over Texas A&M with 137 rushing yards and 95 passing yards to earn Big 12 Offensive Player of the Week honors.

"We're really making a lot of progress," Crouch said. "Our timing and chemistry is good and we're playing very good football right now. I think we made a big statement today, beating a top-five team and showing how good we are."

that the Wildcats turned the ball over 27 times. For the sake of reference, the high for turnovers in a game last season was also 27, accomplished three times by the Wildcats. Including Sunday's contest, the Wildcats have won three of the four games in which they have turned the ball over 27 times in the past two seasons.

That fact, however, doesn't make the players or Patterson feel better.

"I think on offense, we're just not all there yet,"senior center Angie Finkes said. "We were just very impatient with our offense. That's definitely an area we need to clean up."

"I think on offense, we're just not all there yet. We were just very impatient with our offense. That's definitely an area we need to clean up."

— Angie Finkes, senior center

In spite of the turnovers, K-State dominated much of the game. After junior shooting guard Kim Woodlee hit a deep three-pointer with 13:26 left in the first half to give the Wildcats their first lead at 15-12, K-State never relinquished the lead.

When senior forward Nicky Ramage picked up her second foul midway through the first half, K-State looked to other players to pick up the scoring. K-State was led by senior center Olga Firsova, who scored nine first-half points and finished the game with 13.

Included in the center's first-half burst were consecutive jump shots, one a 15-footer and the second a three-point shot with 7:03 left, to push the K-State lead to 28-19.

Ramage came back in the second half, scoring 13 of her team-high 16 points on five of eight shooting from the field.

The Wildcats shot 56.5 percent for the game, 46.7 percent from the three-point line and 79.2 percent from the foul line.

K-State's success shooting the ball stemmed from several fast-break opportunities as well as inspired play from the post-players, Patterson said.

Finkes chipped in 11 points, most coming from the post, while point guard April Sailors, who had six turnovers in the game, also scored in double figures with 12 points.

Up next for the Wildcats will be the season opener Friday night at home against Drake. The Bulldogs beat K-State 88-67 last year in Des Moines, the third-worst defeat of the 1998-99 season for the Wildcats.

"Drake really took us to school last year. After that game, I wasn't sure I saw one positive thing about the status of our team at that point last year," Patterson said.

Drake defeated AIA earlier this preseason by a score of 88-85 — something of which Patterson has taken note.

"They scored 88 points versus AIA, so we know they can put points on the board, but we also understand that they let AIA score a lot," Patterson said. "I think it will be a very challenging and exciting game."

As the Wildcats moved closer and closer to their matchup against the Huskers, they stayed undefeated and their season was painted with national championship implications.

They knew that to gain the respect they have been striving for since Texas A&M shocked them 36-33 in last year's Big 12 Championship game, K-State would have to beat Nebraska.

Instead, the Huskers struck back in a rage of vengeance almost as powerful as Tanya Harding's thrashing of Nancy Kerrigan and battered K-State like a purple-headed stepchild.

Now, the Wildcats leave Lincoln with the 30-year road curse still intact and their egos badly bruised from the Husker onslaught. They leave Lincoln wondering where their dreams of national dominance went as they try to salvage the rest of the season.

Unfortunately for the Wildcats, unless some miracle happens, K-State will not play for a national championship and possibly could end up playing in the Builders Square Alamo Bowl again.

However, this year the situation is very different from the nightmare of 1998. This season, K-State has no excuses.

Wildcat faithful can't blame this season on Michael Bishop's fumble against the Aggies.

The Wildcats can't blame this season on the misfortune of giving up a 15-point lead.

And the Wildcats can't blame this season on the Bowl Championship Series.

K-State can't blame the loss on referees or unsportsmanlike play, and they can't blame this game on scores being released over the intercom.

K-State has nothing to complain about. The bottom line is they played poorly and Nebraska didn't. They were just beaten.

"We weren't very good, not very good at all, probably in a lot of the phases of the game," head coach Bill Snyder said. "We turned the ball over too many times. But they played awfully well, too, except for the fact that they turned the ball over, too."

First and foremost, K-State had no quarterback. Jonathan Beasley was measly, throwing for only 100 yards, completing three of 19 attempts. Although the junior quarterback was injured, he still overthrew his receivers and nearly collapsed in the pocket.

Adam Helm, who was K-State's savior in a 35-28 win over Iowa State, wasn't much better as the "Blackshirts" made him look like smashed piñata. Helm was sacked five times and gained 1 yard rushing.

The running game didn't look much better. The Huskers held the Wildcats to 92 rushing yards and only Frank Murphy could manage to get past the line of scrimmage, rushing for 51 yards.

"They didn't do anything unusual," offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said. "We just couldn't sustain anything."

To add to the offense's putrid play, Nebraska, who looked vulnerable earlier in the season, played like the Huskers of old, using great defense and nearly unstoppable offense to rack up 41 points on one of the best defenses in the country.

Adding to the tyranny was K-State's special teams play. The Huskers blocked a punt and a field goal and never gave David Allen the chance to return a punt.

"If the offense isn't working, there is no way you will win," Allen said. "There were just too many mistakes in the offense and the kicking game. We just didn't do it today."

K-State played bad, that's a no-brainer. Nebraska was unstoppable, with the exception of 10 fumbles. Eric Crouch did anything he wanted, and the "Blackshirts" spent most of the day on top of a K-State quarterback.

This season, it's no surprise, but K-State was no Nebraska. They beat some teams pretty badly, but they were far from being dominating. They lost eight offensive starters and lacked a great quarterback.

Additionally, they lacked an offensive game plan and the undying consistency that Frank Solich and the Huskers have. To add to it all, the Wildcats were not good enough to beat them at Memorial Stadium. Getting a victory there is like trying to rob Fort Knox. It's not very easy. But when all the smoke clears and all the hype disappears from the game, all that remains is the defeat.

Yes, the unfortunate end to this season is really all K-State's fault. They played poorly and they just didn't have what it took to beat Nebraska.

Now, though, the Cats have two choices. They can either slouch and complain about getting whooped or they can bounce back. Coupled with a little luck from the football gods, the Wildcats could still turn this already good season in to an unforgettable one.

If the Wildcats beat Missouri, and Colorado somehow beats Nebraska in Boulder, then the Wildcats have the chance to redeem themselves in the Big 12 Championship game.

Still, the Wildcats have to take control and finish the season without making excuses.

"Last season, we let that loss in St. Louis get us beat in San Antonio," Snyder said. "I think this football team has a great deal of character, that has been evidenced by some of the comebacks. I want to believe this football team will respond the right way and can get back on track."

OUTDOOR RECEPTACLES

Recycling receptacles have been placed at strategic locations on campus to expand the collection of recyclable material. Most of the sites have three receptacles for the collection of aluminum cans, PETE# 1 plastic bottles, and newspapers. The labeled receptacles are located next to wooden trash receptacles so individuals can deposit materials appropriately. Please help our recycling crew by removing plastic lids and emptying beverage containers before placing them in the receptacles.

RECYCLE

K-STATE RECYCLES!

RECYCLING CHALLENGE

K-State Recycles is challenging other Kansas universities and colleges and the University of Nebraska to collect the largest number of aluminum cans during the week of November 15-November 20. All proceeds will be donated to the Manhattan Breadbasket. Bring your cans to the K-State Recycles trailer which will be located north of the Union all week.

RECYCLING AT K-STATE

Kansas State University is committed to becoming a more environmentally aware community by expanding recycling efforts across the campus. This will enhance the campus environment, minimize the waste stream, decrease waste management costs and prolong the life of landfills. The Recycling Program started in 1989 and is coordinated through the Custodial Department. Currently, 30 facilities are participating in some form of recycling. The Program is now being restructured to better serve the University community. We are relocating existing receptacles, adding new receptacles, including new products and increasing staff in order to improve recycling efforts. In 1999, the Recycling Program received City/University Funds to improve recycling efforts. This funding provided recycling receptacles for outdoor use, educational programs, and student wages. Riley County, the City of Manhattan, and K-State received a Grant from Bureau of Waste Management/Kansas Department of Health and Environment in 1999 to purchase two trailers to collect recyclable materials.

In the Fall of 1998 a Campus Recycling Committee was formed to coordinate and enhance recycling effort on campus. Steve Galitzer, Director of Environmental Health and Safety, is Chairman of the Recycling committee.

Indian heritage inspires artist to call on stories of ancestors

By KEVIN SELDERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Inspired by her American Indian heritage, Tamara Goodson tells stories using her paintbrush.

Goodson, senior in fine arts, will be presenting some of her paintings today through Friday in the Willard Hall art gallery. The exhibit fulfills a requirement for the bachelor of fine arts degree.

"It's a lot of work and kind of stressful, but I think it will be good to see it all up together," Goodson said.

As a member of the Otoe-Missouria and Iowa tribes, Goodson uses the images and stories of her ancestors in her paintings.

"One of my inspirations is my great-grandfather, who was a religious leader of the Otoe-Missouria tribe," she said. "He would often go to Washington for land negotiations."

Goodson, who enjoys explaining her paintings, admits her artwork can be difficult to understand.

"People usually love it or don't understand it, but that's to be expected," she said. "There is a lot of good art out there I don't get."

The paintings, which Goodson describes as contemporary American Indian art, can take up to a month to complete. However, Goodson said she enjoys spending time on them.

"I really enjoy painting five hours at a go. I've even painted for seven hours before," she said.

While at K-State, Goodson has been on the dean's honor roll in the College of Arts and Sciences and received multicultural academic awards and the KSU Alumni Association multicultural leadership award. She also has served two terms as president of the K-State Native American Student Body.

"Tamara has made a significant contribution to the K-State student body, including Native American students, non-traditional students and the general student body," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said. "She was also named one of the 12 most outstanding student leaders last year."

Goodson also is a member of the Rose Hill Native American dance performers group. She has been competing in powwow dancing since she was 12 years old, and she now uses it to educate people of American Indian culture.

"I also like to paint Indian dancers," Goodson said. "I'll take a picture of them, blow it up and then paint it."

Tamara Goodson, senior in fine arts, displays her oil paintings in the Willard Hall art gallery. The display will be open today through Friday.

KELLY GLASSCOCK/COLLEGIAN

With her degree, Goodson has a concentration in illustration and can create art digitally.

"She can move from traditional painting to the use of digital tools to express herself and the ideas she tries to illustrate," said Robert Hower, professor of art and head of visual communications.

Goodson's illustration portfolio will be presented in a graphic design review at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art on Dec. 9.

The presentation is for family members and businesses to review the works of K-State seniors in art.

After she graduates in December, Goodson said she hopes to get a job as an illustration artist. However, traditional painting remains her favorite art form.

"It's pure satisfaction — being able to envision a painting and then get the final project," she said. "It feels good to see it finished."

Union plans holiday activities, events to bring campus together in spirit of season

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although November's unseasonably warm weather has thrown many people off about what time of year it is, the holiday season is on its way and coming more quickly with each passing day.

The K-State Student Union has many activities planned for the remaining weeks of school for students, faculty and alumni to enjoy, Cindie Snyder, marketing and promotions manager, said.

"We like to have a holiday spirit and atmosphere around, especially when many students are away from home for the holidays," she said. "We want to add to the season so that the campus feels more like home."

Snyder said the Union Program Council is offering a Santa suit rental Dec. 1-22. Two suits are available for rental. For more information, contact the UPC office at 532-6571.

Holiday baked goods, such as Swedish Braid and tea rings, K-State crown rolls and holiday cookie assortments also will be available during the holiday season through the Union bakery, Snyder said.

One of the biggest events being planned to celebrate the upcoming holidays is Wildcat Wonderland. Carrie Mitchell, assistant manager of the Union Bookstore, said this is the third time for the event, and each year it has continued to grow.

"This is a way of bringing everyone on campus together," Mitchell said. "We have evolved into such a large entity that many people do not know a lot about what goes on at K-State. This is a night to highlight the campus."

Wildcat Wonderland will be from 4 to 8 p.m. Friday on the second floor of the Union. Mitchell said the goal of the event is to get people throughout campus to come and highlight what they have done.

She said representatives from Call Hall will be bringing samples of their cheeses and ice cream, the Horticulture Club will be offering poinsettias and Christmas cacti to purchase, the creators of the children's show "Four Fish Fly Free" will be giving puppet demonstrations, and the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art will be showcasing upcoming exhibits as well as showing merchandise offered in the gift shop.

As a project for Cats for Cans, sponsored by the Flint Hills Breadbasket, people also can bring non-perishable food items to donate to families in need for the holidays. As a gift, donors will receive a free picture with either Willie the Wildcat or a Purple Santa Claus. Mitchell said the event is like an open house in the winter.

MORE INFO?
Wildcat Wonderland will be Friday from 4 to 8 p.m. on the second floor of the K-State Student Union. For more information about holiday activities in the Union, contact Cindie Snyder at 532-5753.

"It's like a holiday open house, but we try to include everyone on campus and bring them together in one place," Mitchell said. "We like to give the students, faculty and alumni a taste of the holidays and what others are doing at once."

For the evening's entertainment, a trumpet and flute ensemble will perform, and a faculty member from the Department of Fine Arts will offer an opportunity for students to personalize ornaments, piggy banks, stockings and caps for gifts.

Jerri Garretson, author of children's coloring book "Johnny Kaw — The Pioneer Spirit of Kansas" and co-author of "Izzie — Growing Up on the Plains in the 1880s," and Lowell Jack, author of the "Year 2000 Historical Calendar," will be available to sign autographs.

Mitchell said Wildcat Wonderland also will mark the beginning of the biggest sales event for Christmas.

"We have all kinds of items that will be on sale so students and faculty can get some wonderful gift ideas," Mitchell said.

For the fifth year, an Angel Tree will be located in the Union Bookstore. This gives those on campus wishing to help a child the opportunity to choose an angel from the tree and buy a book for the child. Mitchell said the bookstore offers a 25-percent discount on children's books, so all a person has to do is choose an angel, pick out and purchase a book, and the Union Bookstore will gift wrap it. All the packages then will be delivered to the Breadbasket a few days prior to Christmas. The program begins today and continues through Dec. 18.

"It started several years ago with the adopt-a-family program, but this is giving a child a book," Mitchell said. "Education is all about books, so it is a way to help a child get involved with reading."

Snyder said the Union Bookstore also will have a holiday gift shop through the month of December in the Union Courtyard, offering gifts not only for Christmas but also for graduation. Representatives from Smurthwaite Scholarship House will be offering free gift wrapping during this time.

Those in attendance at the latest production of the Department of Music and K-State Theatre — "City of Angels" — might be surprised to see that it doesn't at all resemble the recent movie, but instead is set in the 1940s.

At the center of the musical, which premieres at 8 p.m. Thursday through Saturday at McCain Auditorium, is Stine, a man who desperately wants to turn his novel into a Hollywood screenplay.

There are two different realities going on during the musical, said Doug Hosney, the guest production stage manager for the show.

"Scenes from Stine's screenplay are presented as though they were in a black-and-white movie," Hosney said. "This reality is known as the 'reel world.' The rest of the film is presented in color, which represents the present or the 'real world,' and how Stine is working to have his screenplay produced."

Every actor plays a character in the musical's real world as well as a character in Stine's "reel" world.

Director Kate Anderson worked with many individuals, including Hosney, vocal director Jennifer Edwards, managing director Marci Maullar and orchestra director Bill Wingfield to help prepare the 28 K-State student actors, chorus and orchestra for the award-winning musical.

"'City of Angels' is a complex and strong musical," Anderson said. "There are two different atmospheres, or realities, which can cause great confusion. The cast does a great job at working hard together."

Playwright Larry Gelbart wrote the dialogue for the musical, Anderson said, and it has gained popularity around the United States.

"I am really proud of the cast. They are very talented and they are working really hard on a difficult musical," Anderson said. "There is a mix of actors, as many are freshman, seniors and in between, and also there is a mix between majors and minors in theater between them."

Costumes and scenery in the show are presented in the 1940s style. Hosney said movie posters from the era give suggestive scenic background information. Examples of buildings and outerwear are displayed in these movie posters, allowing the directors to see the real-life 1940s.

A live orchestra plays music right from the 1940s, with swing, jazz and big band sounds featured.

"The musical is really fun and technical. I am glad Doug is here to help us out with the difficult scenes.

"The movie is really exciting, in that it has lots of action, and the music of the big band in Hollywood during the 1940s is also really neat," Maullar said.

Ticket prices for the show are $8 for students and seniors and $11 for the general public.

Group rates also are available. Tickets can be purchased at the McCain box office from noon to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday, or can be ordered from McCain at 532-6428.

Graduate returns to aid in department production

Straight from a stint on Broadway, K-State alumnus Doug Hosney is lending a hand with K-State Theatre's production of "City of Angels."

Hosney, who is taking a six-week break from his work as production stage manager for the Broadway show "It Ain't Nothin' But the Blues," is in Manhattan to help manage and conduct the K-State musical. After the musical has been presented, Hosney said he plans to return to New York City to continue his work.

"City of Angels" is not director Kate Anderson's first opportunity to work with Hosney.

"It has been wonderful working with Doug. I loved working with him 20 years ago, so this is a real joy to have him here," Anderson said.

"The students really enjoy him, as he has a lot to offer them. Doug has many great talents, and I even learn something from every day."

Originally from Manhattan, Hosney received his education from K-State and Rutgers University, where he received his masters of fine arts degree in stage management. From 1977 to 1981, he worked in Manhattan in a management role at McCain Auditorium.

Hosney's professional career in theater extends more than 20 years, and includes Broadway, off-Broadway and regional theater, as well as involvement in national and international tours in theater and dance. Hosney spent three years in Atlanta as the general manager for both the 1994 and 1996 National Black Arts Festivals.

His extensive experience behind the scenes allowed Hosney to work for five years at the New Brunswick Cultural Center, first as a theater consultant, then as director of operations, and finally as vice president. Hosney said his work at the cultural center focused on a $15 million project that included the renovation and management of the 2000-seat State Theater.

The theater is a presenting house featuring world-class symphonies, concerts, dance and theater.

Hosney said he has enjoyed being back in Manhattan and working with K-State theater students.

"All students work very well together," he said. "They have produced a nice ensemble, and even though there are certain main characters that have quite a bit of acting time, everyone is seen and has a moment for themselves to act."

Marci Maullar, managing director for the production, said Hosney has contributed a lot to K-State Theatre's efforts to bring "City of Angels" to the McCain stage.

"It has been wonderful to have Doug with us," Maullar said. "Having him here has been a great opportunity for the students and the staff to see how a professional works under different circumstances. He certainly brings out the best of everyone, and we hope to have him back."

Relief teams fight to save victims of Turkish quake

BY RON KAMPEAS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DUZCE, Turkey — Rescue workers from 23 different countries poured into Turkey and joined thousands of soldiers Sunday in a massive effort to save people believed buried beneath the rubble of Friday's earthquake. The quake killed at least 374 people and injured 3,000 others.

Turks signaled motorists Sunday to shut off their engines in one part of a quake-stricken town so a rescue team could listen for the cries of a child buried beneath slabs of concrete. A block away, the newly homeless lined up for blankets and food.

Emergency crews and volunteer organizations said the organization of the relief efforts stands in contrast to the aftermath of the devastating Aug. 17 earthquake, when relief teams wandered through the quake zone with little idea where their help was needed.

But they said many basics, including food, tools and maps, still are in short supply.

"Some things are better," German rescuer Britta Edinger said, returning to camp after a day of guiding her black German shepherd sniffer, Arisha, through collapsed buildings.

She said a crisis center was established within hours of the quake to help coordinate efforts, but she added that her team had to wait a day until they received maps of the city.

With temperatures plunging and chances of survival beneath the piles of rubble decreasing with every passing hour, the official death toll was expected to rise in the coming days.

But there was still hope.

In one section of town, Turkish rescuers pulled Saziye Bulut from beneath a collapsed five-story building where she had been trapped for 41 hours.

The leader of the relief team that saved her burst into tears after her rescue.

"This is the happiest day of my life," Turgut Ozdemir said. "I will not forget this moment until the end of my life."

Delays in identifying crisis areas left some rescue teams pacing the crisis center.

"We came last night and we wanted to help, but there is no organization," Armenian relief worker Sergei Doshoyan said. "We want to help you," he repeated to a Turkish journalist — a reminder of the deep tensions that still exist between the neighboring countries.

The efforts came as President Clinton left Washington, D.C., on Sunday for a state visit in Turkey. He also will participate in a European summit in Istanbul, Turkey's largest city, then visit Greece, Italy, Bulgaria and Kosovo before returning home Nov. 23.

"This second earthquake was much more severe than we had originally thought," Clinton told reporters aboard Air Force One. "It will be very much on the minds of the Turkish leaders and the Turkish people, and we'll try to be sensitive to that."

Achim Mullar, leading a 29-person German team digging under a collapsed apartment building, commended the Turkish army for its speed in leading his army team to the site — but it took another 12 hours for their equipment to arrive.

"It's not smooth," he said as he watched his team monitor knocking sounds deep into the crush of concrete.

New state official wants schools to drop Indian-based nicknames

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — The state's new director of Indian Affairs is calling on Kansas schools to drop nicknames that he says are offensive to American Indians.

Brad Hamilton, who leads the Office of Indian Affairs, says the names promote stereotypical images that are damaging to young American Indians.

"'Redskins' is one of the most derogatory racist terms," Hamilton said. "If you're growing up and you are constantly being bombarded with the mascot image of the noble savage or the savage throwing something with an angry look on his face, that's promoting a stereotype."

Hamilton, a descendent of Apache and Yuma tribes in Arizona, was named to the office in October.

His call to drop the nicknames has support from the leaders of two tribes in Kansas, the Kickapoo and Sac and Fox nations.

"Who really gave us the name 'Redskins'?" said Don Pelcher, chairman of the Sac and Fox nation of Missouri. "Why don't they call themselves 'the Whiteskin Warriors,' 'the Yellowskin Warriors' or 'the Blackskin Warriors'?"

Not everyone is critical of Indian mascots.

Josh Neufeld, a 15-year-old freshman at Little River High School, doesn't mind his school's nickname, the Redskins.

"Even being American Indian, I don't find it offensive," Neufeld said. "It depends on what you find offensive. We call white people 'white people' and black people 'black people.' But our skin isn't really red."

As a member of the high-school band, Neufeld wears a red and black jacket with the name Redskins stitched on it, along with the image of an Indian chief wearing a war bonnet.

"The Indian war bonnet is like a veteran's war record," Hamilton said. "You would never take the Medal of Honor or the Silver Star and do that. You would never do that with holy objects."

In Little River, the image is rooted in tradition.

"We've had our mascot a long time," Andrea Wilcox, 17 said. "It may have started when people were racist, but we're not anymore."

Little River High School announces its name on basketball uniforms and the gymnasium floor but rarely uses an actual person as an Indian mascot, Principal Rosa Belflax said.

The nickname's tradition runs strong in Little River, but if asked to change the nickname, the school district would consider it, Belflax said.

Liberal High School's nickname also is the Redskins, and Principal Jim Maskus doesn't consider it racist.

"We're proud to be called the Redskins," he said.

Liberal High School uses a stylized logo — a hatchet represents the "L" in Liberal with a silhouette of an Indian sitting nearby. The logo is seen just below the sign on the outside school wall that announces "Home of the Redskins."

> "For some reason we're behind a little bit with Native Americans. Do we have these mascots for other racial nationalities if we honor them in that manner."
> — Brad Hamilton, Office of Indian Affairs

"I'd hate to have to change all this," Maskus said. "It'd cost an arm and a leg."

He cautioned other schools against being disrespectful of American Indian culture.

"Any school that uses the Redskins as their nickname, they need to be very careful how it's being used," he said. "It should be used very graciously and we should honor it. Otherwise, it shouldn't be used."

Hamilton, however, questioned how a name that is offensive to a group of people could be considered an honor.

"If what you're honoring is not an honor to the people the symbol represents, then it is not an honor," he said. "For some reason we're behind a little bit with Native Americans. Do we have these mascots for other racial nationalities if we honor them in that manner?"

Hamilton said he hopes to form an educational committee of American Indian representatives that could develop a historically accurate American Indian curriculum for high schools and promote sensitivity to the mascot issue.

"I'm not calling them racists," he said. "It may have been done with the best intentions years ago. But the time has come to look at that and make that change."

last-minute, but 12 schools participated."

Starting this year, the prize will be a traveling trophy.

Students who wish to participate can bring their aluminum cans to several locations.

"They can put them in the recycling bins outside or inside on campus, or they can take them to the trailer that will be parked outside of the K-State Union all week long," said John Woods, director of facilities and custodial services.

A recycling trailer also will be set up at the residence halls.

"Look for the trailers at the east-side dorms Tuesday and Wednesday, and the west-side dorms Thursday and Friday," Woods said.

All the cans collected on campus will be taken to Howie's Recycling Inc. to be counted and weighed. Woods said people also can take their cans directly to Howie's to receive money for them.

The money earned from the cans collected during the week will go to Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Woods said the recycling contest is set up so that every school has a chance to win, even if it is a smaller school.

"It's the total number of cans collected by the college divided by the number of students in the college, so a small college could collect one quarter of the cans of a larger college and still win," he said.

Woods said the contest helps promote the K-State Recycles program. The program will have an information booth in the K-State Student Union today from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Students also can enter a contest near the north entrance of the Union to see who can guess the number of cans in a bale, Woods said.

Those involved with the recycling program said they would like K-State to take home the traveling trophy.

"We would like to win and beat Nebraska and whoever else," Woods said.

EDUCATION

using money derived from just projections over a 10-year period to solve an immediate statewide cash crunch.

"For someone who claims to be fiscally conservative, this seems to be financially foolish," Carlson said.

The 1999 Legislature approved a $50 increase in per-pupil spending on public education for both the 2000 and 2001 fiscal years. It also authorized $3.4 million this year and $8.9 million next year to fund salary enhancements for faculty at the state's six regents universities.

Budget officials now say revenues for fiscal year 1999 ended up $73 million short of projections, and they project a $103 million shortfall in revenue for the current fiscal year.

In response, Gov. Bill Graves has ordered a 1 percent across-the-board cut in general-fund spending this year, and state agencies might have to cut back 6 percent or more in their budget requests for the next.

In higher education, the 1 percent cut this year would equal $6.5 million, more than the amount set aside for salary increases.

Kline, who is seeking the Republican nomination for the 3rd District congressional seat now held by Democrat Dennis Moore, had a leading role in both the budget process and negotiating the 10-year, $10 billion highway program where the windfall is said to exist.

After the session, House Speaker Robin Jennison, R-Healy, ousted Kline from his chairmanship for joining Democrats in passing a bill that was not supported by Graves or Republican leadership.

U.N. imposes sanctions on Afghanistan

By AMIR SHAH
The Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — The United Nations imposed sanctions on Afghanistan on Sunday for refusing to hand over suspected terrorist Osama bin Laden, prompting thousands of protesters into the streets of Kabul shouting "Death to America" and stoning the empty U.S. Embassy.

The sanctions took effect at midnight EST following last-minute pleas from the ruling Taliban army. They are intended to press the Taliban to deliver the Saudi exile to the United States or a third country to stand trial on charges of terrorism.

Protesters swarmed into the streets of the Afghan capital, burning U.S. flags and shouting anti-American slogans. They accused the United Nations of being a "puppet" of the United States.

One young Taliban soldier, his head wrapped in the traditional turban, shouted "long live Osama" — the man the United States believes masterminded last year's twin bombings of U.S. Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania that killed 224 people. Others shouted, "Osama is a great Muslim!"

The mob of men, many of them wearing the traditional turban, baggy pants and long shirt, tried to storm a World Food Program office but was stopped by Taliban soldiers who fired automatic rifles into the air.

They began their march at Pashtunistan Chowk, an intersection in the heart of the city, and surged toward the U.S. Embassy, which has been empty for 10 years, but maintained by a small number of Afghan workers.

The demonstrators picked up rocks and bricks and hurled them at the giant black gate. Taliban soldiers stood guard, preventing them from entering the grounds.

In a statement Saturday, the Taliban Foreign Ministry urged the United Nations either to abandon sanctions or postpone them "to give time for the solution of this problem."

The statement said the Taliban was ready for talks with the United States. Washington, D.C., repeatedly has rejected Taliban offers for talks or alternatives to surrendering bin Laden.

The U.N. sanctions order all states to freeze the Taliban's overseas assets and ban flights owned, leased or operated by the Taliban from taking off or landing. An exemption to the flight ban would be permitted for humanitarian reasons or to allow the Islamic pilgrimage to Mecca.

The sanctions are more modest than those imposed by Washington earlier this year.

Those banned U.S. trade and investment with the Taliban, barred Americans from using the Taliban-run Ariana Afghan airlines and started seizing the airline's $500 million in U.S. assets.

The Taliban have refused to hand over bin Laden, saying that they have no extradition treaty with the United States and that Afghan culture and tradition make it impossible to turn a guest over to his enemies.

The Taliban called the sanctions unreasonable and said "the United Nations has been used as a tool by the United States to victimize Afghanistan." They urged other Muslim nations to ignore the sanctions.

Residents in Kabul who spoke to The Associated Press complained bitterly about the sanctions, the United Nations and United States.

"The Afghan people are dying. ... It is an unfair decision for the Afghan people," high school teacher Mohammed Ibrahim, said. His family home was destroyed by relentless fighting between rival Islamic factions that took control of Kabul from the former communists.

About 70 percent of the capital lies in ruins, ravaged by four years of factional fighting that ended in 1996 when the Taliban army threw out a coalition of Islamic parties headed by former president Burhanuddin Rabbani's government.

The United Nations recognizes Rabbani's government, which now operates in barely 10 percent of Afghanistan. The Taliban, who espouse a harsh brand of Islamic law, rule the remaining 90 percent of the country.

Mohammed Jawaz, who huddled for warmth over a steaming cup of green tea at a rundown restaurant in the heart of Kabul, said he was bewildered by the sanctions.

"It is American's shame," he said. "To impose sanctions on poor Afghanistan when our people are dying — it is a shame for America and for the United States."

Food prices have already begun to climb in Kabul and the Afghan currency has dropped sharply. On Saturday, the Afghani had plummeted to 51,000 to the dollar, from a previous 43,000.

Bin Laden, believed to be in his mid-30s, first came to prominence in Afghanistan in the 1980s, fighting alongside the U.S.-backed mujahedeen or holy warriors against the Soviet Army. After the war, bin Laden built up a movement, called al-Qaida, opposed to the U.S. military presence in Saudi Arabia and emerged as a hero of Islamic resistance to U.S. power.

He has been living in Afghanistan since May 1996, when Rabbani ruled. Since Rabbani's oust, bin Laden has found refuge with the Taliban Islamic militia. The United States has placed bin Laden on the FBI's 10 most-wanted list and has offered a $5 million reward for his arrest.

Russia refuses to cease bombing Chechen capital

By ANGELA CHARLTON
The Associated Press

MOSCOW — The Russian government said Sunday it will not abandon its offensive in Chechnya despite Western calls to end the fighting, while federal forces prepared an offensive on the Chechen capital.

President Boris Yeltsin had a rare Sunday meeting with Prime Minister Vladimir Putin to review Russia's campaign in the breakaway republic and endorse Putin's presidential bid in next year's elections.

Putin's popularity at home has soared in recent weeks because of his hard line on Chechnya.

In Chechnya, Russian Su-24 bombers, Su-25 attack planes and helicopter gunships pounded suspected rebel bases Sunday, though with less intensity than in recent days.

No casualties from Sunday's fighting were reported immediately. Refugees continued to push their way out of the republic.

After claiming control over Chechnya's second-largest city, Gudermes, on Saturday, Russian forces set their sights on the capital, Grozny.

They were regrouping Sunday in eastern Chechnya and preparing for a Grozny offensive, a spokesman at the military press center in Dagestan said, according to the Interfax news agency.

Jesse Jackson leads protest march over expulsion of 7 black students

By DENNIS CONRAD
The Associated Press

DECATUR, Ill. — A standoff over the expulsion of seven black students for fighting continued Sunday as the Rev. Jesse Jackson led a chanting group of some 2,000 people through the streets of this blue-collar town.

"Let it be clear," Jackson told the crowd before the afternoon march. "We'll be back again and again until our children are back in school."

"Too many children are being left behind — suspended, expelled, jailed," he said the children in Decatur "deserve individual due process and not group justice or mob injustice.

The marchers, many of whom came by the busload from out of the area, chanted, "Save the dream, save the children, reclaim the children," and "Leave no child behind, keep hope alive."

The throng began its slow march from the Decatur Civic Center to McArthur High School, singing "We Shall Overcome."

Jackson invited onlookers to join in the march, his latest effort to draw attention to the expulsions, which he considers unfairly harsh.

The six students were expelled for two school years after allegedly taking part in a brawl in the stands at a football game Sept. 17. A seventh withdrew from school during expulsion hearings. The students were black, but Jackson has said it was not a question of racism but whether the students were treated fairly.

Jackson led a similar march Nov. 7, demanding the students be returned to the classroom. Decatur high schools were closed the next two days after school officials feared trouble because of Jackson's presence.

In the meantime, Gov. George Ryan stepped in to negotiate an agreement. At his prodding — and under a national spotlight — the local school board voted to trim the expulsions to one school year and let the students attend alternative education programs.

Jackson said he wants the students returned more quickly. He and state school Superintendent Glenn "Max" McGee have proposed creating a special panel to review the student's conduct and grades in January; those who are doing well might be allowed back in the classroom then.

School officials have refused to discuss the idea so far.

As the parade passed his home Sunday, Todd Walsh, a trucker, signaled his support with two thumbs up.

"It was just a fistfight," he said. "They should have been punished, but not like that."

Some 100 people gathered at a park several miles from the march to listen to members of the Ku Klux Klan, who had planned to stage a counter-demonstration. There were no reports of trouble.

Investigators examine EgyptAir flight recorder

By PAT MILTON
The Associated Press

NEWPORT, R.I. — Investigators set to work Sunday on the cockpit voice recorder from EgyptAir Flight 990, hoping the second so-called black box retrieved from the ocean floor would help explain the airliner's mysterious plunge from the sky.

After a two-week search, the recorder was found Saturday night by a remote-operated robot, and on Sunday it was delivered to National Transportation Safety Board headquarters in Washington, D.C.

NTSB Chairman James Hall said scientists would begin analyzing the recorder immediately to see if its tape was damaged by the destruction of the plane or by its lengthy submersion at a depth of 250 feet.

"I think within the next 24 hours we will be able to characterize the contents on the tape," Hall said.

Civil aviation officials from Egypt and Arabic linguists from the State Department were available to help translate any cockpit conversations in Arabic, Hall said.

If the tape is damaged badly, it likely will be taken to its manufacturer, where more sophisticated equipment could be used to pick up sounds, Hall said.

The New York-to-Cairo jetliner crashed off Massachusetts' Nantucket Island on Oct. 31, killing all 217 people aboard.

Preliminary data from the plane's flight data recorder showed that the Boeing 767's autopilot was switched off and the plane was put into a dive so steep and fast that passengers would briefly have felt weightless.

Both engines were shut off before the aircraft climbed briefly out of its dive and then turned and dropped into the ocean.

"We're certainly hopeful that within the next two or three days that we'll be able to answer a lot of puzzling questions that the information on the flight data recorder has raised in our minds."

— James Hall, NTSB chairman

Barry Schiff, a former TWA 767 pilot from Los Angeles and an aviation accident investigator, has said the data shows that some human factor was responsible rather than some system failure.

Investigators said they hope the voice tape will reveal cockpit conversations or mechanical sounds that will shed light on those events.

"We're certainly hopeful that within the next two or three days that we'll be able to answer a lot of the puzzling questions that the information on the flight data recorder has raised in our minds," Hall said Sunday.

An EgyptAir official said the cockpit voice recorder records over its tape every 30 minutes, unlike the two-hour digital models recommended by the NTSB.

The tape should have lasted long enough to record conversations as the plane climbed to its cruising altitude of 33,000 feet and then plummeted about 40 minutes after takeoff.

The cockpit voice recorder was found amid the plane's debris by Deep Drone, a remote-controlled robot, a day before bad weather in the search area threatened to halt the search again.

The recorder, which was bent on one side, was found not far from where investigators detected the pinging signal from its sonar locater beacon, which had become detached from the recorder.

The head of the FBI's Boston office, Barry Mawn, said more than 250 FBI agents had conducted several hundred interviews related to the crash, but that there was no evidence yet that a crime had been committed.

However, if it becomes apparent that a crime occurred, Mawn said, the FBI would take over as the lead agency in the crash investigation.

2 K-State running backs cited for alcohol violations

By JOSEPH HURLA
Kansas State Collegian

Two K-State football players were issued notices to appear in court for alcohol violations early Sunday morning.

Junior running back Joe Hall, 1700 N. Manhattan Ave., Apt. 112, was issued a notice to appear for minor in possession of alcoholic liquor.

Junior running back Chris Claybon, 3028 Kimball Ave., Apt. 2, was issued a notice to appear for possession of open container in public.

Both players were cited for alcohol violations at 12:24 a.m. Sunday. Riley County Police Department Sgt. Joshua Kyle said they were issued notices to appear at the 1300 block of Laramie Street, in a city lot across from Silverado Saloon.

Hall, who is a sophomore academically but has one year of eligibility remaining, has started five games for the Wildcats this year.

He has been the Cats' leading rusher, gaining 613 yards this season.

Claybon, junior in psychology, has been used sparingly this season. He has appeared in seven games, gaining a total of 26 yards on 11 carries.

Kyle said both players are scheduled to appear for their violations sometime after Nov. 30.

Kent Brown, director of K-State sports information, could not be reached for comment.

Study finds gender-related pay gap in Senate

By CASSANDRA BURRELL
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Women who work for senators will earn about 83 percent of their male colleagues' salaries this year, a report finds.

In 1997, female staff members in the Senate were paid 88 cents for every dollar made by their male counterparts, the Congressional Management Foundation said in a study released today.

The rate in 1991, 78 percent, was the lowest of the decade.

The foundation said the decline between 1997 and 1999 probably can be explained by a small increase in the proportion of women in lower-paying positions, combined with a small decrease of woman in high-paying positions.

Women in Senate offices still made more than female workers nationwide, who earn about 69 cents for every dollar earned by male workers.

"Additionally, 37 percent of Senate staff in executive positions are female, compared to a 22—percent executive female staffing level for federal agencies" and 11 percent in Fortune 500 companies, the foundation said in a written statement.

According to the study, the typical Senate staffer is young, well-educated, single and childless — and will change jobs soon.

Sixty-three percent of Senate's staff members are unmarried and 70 percent have no children.

"A combination of a good economy, loosening budgets and high demand for white-collar workers has probably led the Senate to be less frugal in the pay of its staff, and will likely lead to less staff turnover."

— Rich Shapiro, executive director

The average age is 33.8 years, and nearly 90 percent hold at least a bachelor's degree.

"In contrast, workers nationwide are approximately 5 years older, 65 percent are married and only 25 percent have at least a bachelor's degree," the foundation said.

Nearly 50 percent of Senate staff members have held their current position for less than one year.

Chiefs of staff received the highest average salary — $116,573, the study said, while Washington-based staff assistants — workers who file, fax, answer the telephone and greet visitors — had the lowest average salary, $22,504.

Black Senate staff earned 76 percent of the pay of white colleagues, and Hispanics earned 82 percent. Nationally, black employees earned 71 percent of white workers' salaries and Hispanics earned 66 percent, the study said.

"As with the gender gap, the differential between the pay of white and minority Senate staff primarily resulted from the over-representation of minorities in lower-paying jobs and their under-representation in higher-paying jobs," it said.

The average salary of all Senate staff increased by 6.3 percent this year to $42,037, the report said.

"The data is good news for Senate staff and the overall health of the institution," Rich Shapiro, the foundation's executive director, said.

"A combination of a good economy, loosening budgets and high demand for white-collar workers has probably led the Senate to be less frugal in the pay of its staff, and will likely lead to less staff turnover."

Senate employees continued to trail behind other workers with similar education levels, the study said.

"Senate staff with bachelor's degrees earned 32.5 percent less than workers with bachelor's degrees nationally — up from the 21-percent pay gap in 1997," the foundation said. "Senate staff with master's degrees and doctorate degrees earned 16 percent and 33 percent less than their respective counterparts across the country."

The foundation produced the report with the support of two trade groups — American Financial Services Association and the National Food Processor Association — and a labor union, the National Rural Letter Carriers Association.

The foundation is a nonprofit, nonpartisan organization that seeks to improve the effectiveness of Congress through better management practices. The group receives funding from corporations, fees for management services provided to individual House and Senate offices and other sources.

Scientists find genetic flaw that might promote cancer

By MALCOLM RITTER
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Scientists have identified an inherited genetic mutation that might make people more vulnerable to colon cancer, possibly playing a role in up to 9 percent of cases diagnosed each year in the United States.

If confirmed, the work might someday help doctors identify patients who should be tracked especially closely for early signs of the disease.

The mutation apparently promotes cancer by hindering a process that keeps cell growth under control, said Dr. Kenneth Offit of the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York. He presents the work in today's issue of the journal Cancer Research.

Dr. Sanford Markowitz of the Case Western Reserve University School of Medicine in Cleveland, who did not participate in the work, said the result would be important if borne out by further work.

"This is a provocative finding that is crying out to be confirmed by additional studies," Markowitz said in a telephone interview.

The mutation affects the ability of a natural protein called transforming growth factor beta to control cell growth. The protein binds to a structure called a receptor on cells, and the mutation appears to hinder slightly the receptor's ability to respond properly.

People inherit two copies of the gene in which the mutation can appear, one copy from each parent. The added cancer risk is more pronounced when both copies carry the mutation, Offit said. It's not clear how much of a risk the mutation produces.

The researchers found that the mutation was more common in people with cancer than healthy people, which suggests it plays a role in the disease.

Nine of 851 people with various types of cancer carried the mutation in both copies of the gene, compared to none of 735 healthy people. Four of the people with both copies mutated had colon cancer, two had testicular cancer, and each of the remaining three had a different cancer.

Bishops consider tighter school control

By JULIA LIEBLICH
The Associated Press

America's Roman Catholic bishops, caught between Vatican demands and a tradition of academic independence, will meet this week to decide whether to exert tighter control over the nation's 235 Catholic colleges and universities.

At issue are proposed requirements that Catholic theologians get a mandate from a bishop to teach, and that wherever possible, a majority of board members and faculty should be committed Catholics.

A committee of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, whose annual meeting starts today in Washington, D.C., will recommend approval of its latest draft of guidelines for the schools, said the panel's chairman, Bishop John Leibrecht of Springfield, Mo.

Such guidelines, he said, will prevent an erosion of Catholic identity at the schools, which enroll 670,000 students, without sacrificing academic freedom.

"The bishops want institutions to have autonomy," he said.

Leading Catholic educators continue to attack the guidelines as a threat. Bishop John D'Arcy of the Ft. Wayne-South Bend, Ind., diocese, has called for continuing a structured dialogue"between the prelates and college presidents and theologians.

The hope, D'Arcy wrote in a message to his diocese, is for "a solution which protects the pastoral responsibility of the bishop and the theologian's freedom of inquiry." Asked whether he will call for postponing the vote, he said through a spokesman only that bishops should vote according to their conscience.

The Rev. Michael Scanlan, president of the Franciscan University of Steubenville, Ohio, said the rules will help Catholic institutions distinguish themselves from secular schools.

"They're empowering," said Scanlan, who described his school as orthodox. "It enables you to project more clearly who you are."

Governor requests legislators' travel records

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Gov. Bill Graves has asked for travel records of all legislators, just days after a legislator requested the records of Graves' cabinet secretaries.

Graves also plans to gather administrative travel information from one year during the term of former Gov. Joan Finney, Graves' spokesman Don Brown said.

Travel records have come under scrutiny after former secretary of aging Thelma Hunter Gordon resigned Nov. 1, after it was disclosed that she had taken numerous out-of-state trips and awarded a $135,000 no-bid consulting contract to her former deputy, Terry Glasscock.

He is the brother of House Majority Leader Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, whose wife is Graves' chief of staff.

After Gordon's resignation, a legislator asked the Legislative Research Department, which serves as the staff of the Legislature, for the travel records of Graves' cabinet secretaries and other high-level employees.

In asking for the travel records, Brown said, Graves wanted to make sure the detailed travel information being provided for cabinet agencies is put in the proper perspective with travel both by the previous administration and travel by the legislative branch.

But a fellow Republican, House Speaker Robin Jennison of Healy, said Graves' request "doesn't serve a good purpose, and it's going to be viewed as almost childish."

Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, said he has no problem with the request.

Housing-board issue draws public skepticism

■ New housing commission to nominate board members despite residents' concerns.

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

The new public housing commission has not been created, yet it already is mixed in controversy.

At tonight's meeting, the City Commission will receive nominations for the new housing commission, which will govern public housing independently. In the past, a housing board served in an advisory position to the City Commission, but, in accordance with national regulations, the housing authority has been given sovereignty from the city.

The new commission will have five members, who might end up being the same five members as the original advisory board.

"The mayor has recommended that the five existing board members be nominated for the commission," Jai Johnson, housing director, said.

This construction and personnel of the new commission have received criticism from Speak United, an activist group made up of housing residents. Even the housing authority's separation from the city has drawn some residents' ire.

"There are a lot of problems in housing now," said Ida Leupold, housing resident and co-chair of the Pottawatomie Court Association. "If this happens, it looks like it could be a real disaster."

Leupold's latest claims of harassment stem from the last City Commission meeting. Leupold said the meeting was adjourned, and the residents attending the meeting left. Shortly afterward, the meeting was reopened, and the construction of the new commission, which is of primary interest to the group, was discussed, Leupold said.

"If they're pulling this kind of stuff now, I feel they're going to get worse and worse when they get away from the city," Leupold said.

Kay Glenn, vice chair woman and the board's appointed resident, said the claim is wrong.

"That's not so," Glenn said. "First of all, we're governed by rules we have to abide by. The residents often leave after the discussion is over. Just because they leave doesn't mean the meeting was adjourned. The residents need to educate themselves about the rules and regulations."

Leupold said she worries residents will not be well represented with just one resident on the commission. She said she would prefer a seven-member board, with the extra chairs filled by residents.

"I feel residents should have more say into how housing is run," Leupold said. "I don't feel like the one resident appointed by the mayor is doing that much for residents."

Glenn said a seven-member commission is a good idea.

"It's hard to feel one person is representative of all the tenants," Glenn said. "I feel there needs to be a representative from all housing sites. I'd be happy to see that. I keep telling them it's not enough to have someone sitting on the board, though. You have to be able to carry the vote.

"The residents also need to read the policies before they get to the meeting so when they get there, they are in a position to negotiate."

Glenn also said she feels that the commission will benefit from independence with the City Commission because it will not have to wait for city approval to make changes.

"Now the buck stops with the commission," Glenn said. "Our work will be a bit more efficient and a bit more effective without the delay we've been incurring from the city."

Officials laud decentralized empowerment

By TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

Decentralization of power allows K-State to offer a sense of community that is unduplicated elsewhere in higher education, University President Jon Wefald said.

He said the theme of the Wefald administration is empowerment — a virtue that eliminates top administrators from determining important decisions on campus. Wefald said the power structure at K-State allows administrators, faculty and students to be involved in university decisions.

"We are underfunded, but we hire superb people and let them do their jobs," he said. "I feel like I'm just like anybody else. I feel I can't be successful if all the other people down the line aren't successful."

Success involves delegating authority to K-State's nine college deans to run their respective programs, and giving Faculty Senate and Student Senate freedom to voice opinions, Wefald said. Since his presidency began in 1986, Wefald said he has not vetoed an action by

Graduate work smallest concern for student also juggling job with time for raising 4-year-old

■ STORY BY SHANNON DELMEZ

Fouquet, reads to her 4-year-old son, Tim, as part of his bedtime routine. Monica tries to read to Tim every night before bed.

Coming from a long line of K-Staters, Monica Fouquet, graduate student in communication sciences and speech pathology, didn't have to look far when deciding on a college.

"I came to K-State because everyone else in my family did," she said. "Timothy followed right along."

Timothy is Fouquet's son, now aged 4 1/2, who arrived on the K-State campus as an infant so his mother could begin her undergraduate studies.

"I graduated from high school and came right here, and I've been here ever since," she said. "We've been here for 4 1/2 years, and I just began my graduate program."

The day begins

A typical day for Fouquet and her son begins between 5 and 6 a.m.

"I try to do a little bit of catch-up homework and get my bag ready. Then I get Timothy up around 7, and we go to school. He goes to day care, and I go to school," she said.

Class is followed by work for a few hours. Fouquet is employed at the Jardine Terrace Apartments, managing the buildings in the area around where she lives.

Then she is off to complete another task.

"In my program, we have clients that we see and provide speech therapy for, so I have a client or two as well," she said. "And by that time it's 5 or 6, and I pick up Timothy."

Quality time between mother and son is spent preparing and eating the evening meal. Sometimes the meal is followed by a night class for mom.

"One night a week I have class at night," she said. "Then, two nights a week I have classes that are fun for me."

About 9 p.m., Fouquet puts Timothy to bed and begins her homework, which usually keeps her up until midnight or 1 a.m.

"And then it starts all over again," Fouquet said.

Time management

Fouquet said one of the biggest problems of being a student and a parent is the pressure of trying to balance how much time to spend doing homework and how much time to spend with her child.

"Everybody always wants something done, but you have to realize that your first priority is your child," she said. "Sometimes it happens that way, and sometimes it doesn't. I never feel like I spend enough time with him, but if I do spend all the time with him that I need to, then other things get neglected.

"You have to decide whether or not you want to finish school, and be able to provide for him in the future, or spend as much time now so he grows up right."

Fouquet said she schedules appointments in her planner for spending time with her son.

"I open my book to make sure I can do something at this time, and if it says 'Tim,' then I automatically say no," she said.

Fouquet also must help with activities and hobbies for Tim. Fouquet is helping her son raise sea monkeys. However, the main thing on Tim's mind is his fifth birthday.

"I'm going to be five in December, because my birthday is in December," he said.

Another thing that makes balancing parenthood and education more demanding for Fouquet is the extra work that being a student requires.

"When you come home at 5, your day is not over," Fouquet said. "You still have four or five hours worth of homework and trying to get stuff ready for work the next day. Other people have to get ready for work, but when they come home at 5, everything that is not done gets left at the office sitting on a desk for the next morning, and for a student, it doesn't. It follows you home in your little bookbag. You have more to do, and then trying to find time to do it is another story."

U.S. labor force ready to protest trade decision

By MARTIN CRUTSINGER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The United States and China reached a significant trade agreement Monday that offers the prospect of billions of dollars in increased overseas sales for American manufacturers, farmers and high-tech industries. But labor unions said they would fight the deal in Congress as a job-killer.

After being criticized by business leaders for walking away from an April trade agreement with China, President Clinton moved in recent weeks to restart the stalled talks through personal phone calls to Chinese President Jiang Zemin, who gave the go-ahead a week ago for Clinton to send a high-level bargaining team to Beijing.

"This is a good agreement for China, for America and for the world," an elated Clinton told reporters at a news conference in Ankara, Turkey.

Major business groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Business Roundtable, joined him in praising the agreement and pledged to work for congressional approval.

The package was denounced by labor unions, the U.S. textile industry and others who face intense competition from lower-priced Chinese imports.

In exchange for Beijing's agreement to slash tariffs and other trade barriers that now keep U.S. products away from China's 1.3 billion consumers, the United States will support China's membership in the World Trade Organization, the 135-member Geneva-based organization that sets the rules for global trade.

U.N. back dues to be paid after 7-year struggle

By BARRY SCHWEID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Clinton administration claimed victory Monday in a seven-year struggle to persuade Congress to pay millions of dollars in back dues to the United Nations, saying restrictions in the deal on backing for international family planning would have no practical effect.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, who played a pivotal role in lobbying Congress from the time she was ambassador to the United Nations, said the compromise struck over the weekend with Republican leaders had bolstered U.S. national security.

"It's a very important decision," Albright said in Ankara, Turkey, where she was traveling with President Clinton.

If, by January, the United States had not paid $350 million of its arrears, estimated at $1.3 billion to $1.6 billion by the United Nations, it stood to lose its seat in the U.N. General Assembly.

The United Nations, meanwhile, sounded a note of caution.

Only $100 million of the back dues would be paid in the first year, and the remainder would be released to the organization only under certain conditions, the U.N. Information Center said.

These include U.N. members agreeing to reduce the U.S. share of dues to 22 percent from 25 percent and the U.S. share of peacekeeping costs to 25 percent from 31

Man charged with murder for death of sister-in-law

OSKALOOSA, Kan. — A man who complained to reporters that they did not report his sister-in-law's disappearance fast enough was charged Monday with first-degree murder in her death.

Floyd S. Bledsoe was ordered detained without bond after making his first court appearance.

Bledsoe was charged in the death of 14-year-old Zetta "Camille" Arfmann. The girl was the sister of Bledsoe's wife, Heidi Bledsoe, and lived with them in a mobile home near Oskaloosa.

Bledsoe's brother, Thomas Bledsoe, initially was arrested Nov. 9 and charged with first-degree murder. Thomas Bledsoe was released Friday on his own recognizance.

Thomas Bledsoe, 25, lives with his parents near the field where the girl's body was found buried under trash and dirt in a ditch. Jefferson County sheriff's deputies said Thomas Bledsoe led them to the body.

Sheriff Roy Dunnaway said Thomas Bledsoe was released as part of an agreement between his defense attorney, Michael Hayes, and Jefferson County Attorney Jim Vanderbilt.

Floyd Bledsoe, 23, was arrested about 3 a.m. Saturday as a result of information and evidence obtained late Friday, Dunnaway said.

Camille disappeared Nov. 5. She was last seen walking into the mobile home after getting off the school bus.

She was reported missing early Nov. 6, and her body was found Nov. 8. She had died of a gunshot wound.

Floyd Bledsoe had talked with reporters on the day his brother was arrested and complained that they always jump in after the kill has been made, The Lawrence Journal-World reported.

Meteor shower viewers eye weather forecast anxiously

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — Amateur astronomers anxiously scanned the weather forecasts Monday in preparation for what could be a spectacular meteor shower.

This year's Leonid meteor shower is expected to peak tonight and Wednesday night.

Although the best watching is forecast for North Africa, the Middle East and Europe, astronomers say sightings also could abound for sky watchers along the East Coast.

The National Weather Service predicted some cloudiness across much of the Northeast on both nights, but skies are likely to be mostly clear from New York City south.

The meteor shower is made up of a hail of dusty, icy rubble thrown off by the Tempel-Tuttle comet as it races around the sun.

When the Earth's orbit carries it into the path of these cosmic pellets, they burn up in the atmosphere in a display of shooting stars.

Some astronomers predict this year's display could send 2,000 or more meteors blazing through the atmosphere every hour in the liveliest display since 1966, when it peaked in a storm of 144,000 per hour.

A typical year might yield just 20 per hour.

Commission finds evidence of discrimination inside CBS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission says it has found evidence that CBS Inc. has discriminated against female technicians at its TV stations.

The women were subjected to disparate treatment in salary, amount of overtime, promotion opportunities and training, wrote Spencer H. Lewis, Jr., director of the EEOC's New York district office, in an Oct. 29 ruling.

"In addition, evidence of record indicates a sexually hostile environment at (CBS), in that female technicians have been subject to endure verbal sexual harassment by their colleagues and by management. Evidence of record also indicates that several female technicians have been retaliated against for complaining about sex discrimination," the ruling said.

The document provides no further details of the allegations.

"As a company, CBS is, and has been, committed to creating a workplace that fosters fair employment practices," network spokesman Dana McClintock said. "We welcome the EEOC's invitation to discuss this matter and look forward to resolving it as soon as possible."

Nurse receives life sentence for killing 6 elderly patients

BRAZIL, Ind. — A former nurse was sentenced Monday to spend the rest of his life in prison for murdering six of his elderly patients, a crime the judge called "a paragon of evil at its most wicked."

Orville Lynn Majors was sentenced to six consecutive 60-year terms for giving lethal injections of heart-stopping drugs to six patients being treated at Vermillion County Hospital in the mid-1990s.

In a courtroom packed with relatives of the victims, Judge Ernest Yelton stared at Majors as he imposed the maximum penalty.

"He was entrusted with these people's care. In response, he committed diabolical acts that extinguished the frail lives of six people," Yelton said.

Relatives of Majors' victims broke into tears as Yelton read the sentences. Majors would have to serve at least 180 years before being eligible for early release.

"At long last, may the souls of Mary Ann Alderson, Dorothea Dixon, Luella Hopkins, Margaret Hornick, Freddie Dale Wilson, Derek Maxwell and Cecil Smith rest in peace," Yelton said.

Majors, 38, was convicted Oct. 17 of killing six patients — all those mentioned by the judge except Smith. A mistrial was declared in Smith's case because jurors could not reach a decision.

Investigators suggest Majors gave lethal injections to dozens of patients at the hospital.

A nursing supervisor's study showed Majors was present at 130 of 147 deaths from March 1993 to March 1995, when the hospital fired him. A more scientific study, ordered by police, found Majors was on duty for 63 of 67 deaths in the last six months of 1994.

Adviser of the Year

Blue Key selects horticulture therapy professor for award

BY IVAN KOZAR
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A committee of Blue Key Honorary Society members sorted through more than 20 nominations last month for adviser of the year.

In the end, an adviser from the College of Agriculture stood out from the crowd.

Richard Mattson, professor of horticulture therapy, was named Adviser of the Year, an award sponsored by the Office of Student Activities and Services.

"I don't think that I've had an award that means more than this," Mattson said. "It's a fantastic recognition."

Mattson, who got his Ph.D. from the University of Minnesota, started his K-State career in 1969 as an assistant professor in horticulture and has been advising since.

In 1975, Mattson became director of the horticultural therapy program and has worked with the Menninger Clinic in Topeka.

Sarah Dillingham, graduate assistant at OSAS, said 22 nominations were brought in for adviser of the year.

"You really need to be available or let students know how to get in touch with you if there is a problem."

— Richard Mattson, professor of horticulture therapy

Mattson stood out because of his outstanding service to students, his evolvement in special development growth and because he cares for the the professional as well as the academic welfare of his students, Dillingham said.

"You really need to be available or let students know how to get in touch with you if there is a problem," Mattson said. "I always try to respond to e-mail messages and phone calls as promptly as possible.

"Many times, you need insight as to what the student is going through. You have to be aware that they go through growing-up pains and suffer through relationships."

"There's a lot of changes that occur through a student's life. You have to be on top of these things — you can't put them off, and you have to be available."

Mattson was nominated by Katie Stucky, sophomore in horticulture therapy and president of the Horticulture Club, and Kori Stotts, senior in horticulture therapy.

"He is very humble about what he does, and we thought this would be a good way to recognize him," Stucky said. "He's the only horticulture therapy adviser there is, and he does a lot of work. He's really easy to talk to, and I'm in there at least once a week."

K-State to create new honorary society

BY COURTNEY DUFFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new honorary society will give students the chance to become more familiar with how they can benefit from international relations.

The honorary Sigma Iota Rho is being established at K-State this semester.

"Last year, Dr. Pickering shared information concerning KSU's application to form a local chapter of Sigma Iota Rho. I read the proposal and made brief comments and made a minor suggestion or two," said Bradley Shaw, associate professor of modern languages.

Jeffrey Pickering, associate professor of political science, will be the chapter adviser for the first two years.

He said they have been trying to get the word out about the honorary society through faculty and other resources.

"We have asked the faculty around campus to announce it in their classes," Pickering said.

Applications to join the honorary society are available in the office of the Department of Political Science in Waters Hall and are due Friday. Pickering said a committee made up of faculty members will decide which students meet the criteria to join.

To join the honorary society, students must have a least 20 hours in internationally related courses and a cumulative grade point average of at least 3.2 on a scale of 4.0, Pickering said. A variety of classes would count as internationally related courses, including modern language, history and economics.

Pickering said there will be great opportunities for students once the honorary society is established.

"Once we get started, a portion of members' dues will remain within the chapter," Pickering said. "Student members will decide how they want to use this resource, perhaps bringing in speakers or sponsoring other activities on campus."

Shaw said the honorary society will be beneficial to students in several ways.

"I think students in international relations and international studies in general might have interest in joining the honorary. It is a way to get to know other students and faculty who share an interest in international affairs and issues," Shaw said. "It provides an opportunity for leadership in a local organization, and it should help promote the international dimension of the undergraduate experience here at KSU."

The honorary society will enhance students' awareness of how international the world has become, Shaw said.

"I think that we are all international, whether we know it or not, and I know that many students feel the same way," Shaw said. "I am sure that enthusiastic students will be strong advocates for international studies at KSU."

Flight 990 cockpit voice recorder data inconclusive

BY GLEN JOHNSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board said Monday he is confident there will be a resolution of the crash of EgyptAir Flight 990 — although he raised the possibility of shifting oversight of the inquiry to another agency.

Jim Hall told a news conference that his confidence was bolstered by information being extracted from the plane's flight data and cockpit voice recorders.

Nonetheless, Hall said the progress of the investigation was being slowed by a painstaking process of translating the cockpit voice information from Arabic, the native language of the pilots, to English.

He said he was aware of rumors, theories and stories circulating about the possibility of a criminal act causing the Oct. 31 crash.

Hall added: "We are concentrating our efforts on determining from the evidence whether or not this investigation is to remain under the leadership of the National Transportation Safety Board."

In the case of a criminal act, oversight would shift to the FBI.

Hall answered only a few questions and referred reporters back to his statement when he was asked about oversight of the investigation.

On Sunday, the NTSB said a first session listening to the cockpit voice recorder proved inconclusive, but a source close to the investigation said the pilots were talking at times like pals.

But speculation about a possible hijacking, crew fight or pilot suicide lingers because the flight data recorder shows that the plane's autopilot was turned off, the aircraft put into a dive, the throttles cut back and the engines shut off.

Veteran pilots said they could not envision an airplane-related scenario that would prompt the crew to take those steps.

Hall said investigators were working to synchronize the cockpit voice and flight data recorder information in their search for answers.

"As painstaking a process as it is," Hall said, "this one is made more difficult by the fact that it is almost entirely in a foreign language."

The chairman, however, remained optimistic.

"Because of the quality and the extensive information contained on the flight data recorder, I am confident that many of the questions we have, you have and the individuals following this investigation around the world have, will be answered," Hall said.

The New York-to-Cairo jetliner crashed off Massachusetts' Nantucket Island, killing all 217 people on board.

After a two-week search, the recorder was found Saturday night by a remote-operated robot. It was delivered to NTSB headquarters in Washington on Sunday.

Efforts to find clues in the plane's wreckage had stopped Monday because of the weather, said Navy Chief Petty Officer Jack O'Neill.

"All the ships have been moved from the area because the sea state is so terrible out there," he said. "We're looking at three solid days of 12- to 13-foot seas."

O'Neill said Navy crews had completed preliminary mapping of the ocean floor and started taking a closer look at areas that look like they could be something.

There had been no finds of note, O'Neill said.

"So far, it's usually just clam beds," he said.

Preliminary data from the plane's flight data recorder showed that the Boeing 767's autopilot was switched off and the plane was put into a dive so steep and fast that passengers briefly would have felt weightless.

Qualified admissions should be scrutinized

Whether students like it or not, qualified admissions is coming to a university near you, specifically this one. With it comes new responsibilities for high schools, to ensure their students are ready; and to K-State administrators, to ensure that everyone who wants a higher education has access to one in some form.

K-State's black population has the greatest risk of losing students, because in the past three freshmen classes there has been a significant difference between black students meeting the criteria compared to their white counterparts.

K-State should remain dedicated to attaining and retaining minority students. As it stands, the policy, which will go into effect in January 2000 has an exception policy that allows 10 percent of the incoming classes admittance without meeting the standards. Hopefully, part of that 10-percent window will help attain critical minority numbers.

However, the admission officers also should consider students with special circumstances. For example, high school students who goofed around until their senior year, realized they wanted to go to college, did exceptionally well their senior year and proved they are willing to work hard, even if they failed to meet qualifications, should be given an opportunity at K-State. Another example might be students who dealt with tragedies throughout high school and weren't able to dedicate the time necessary to meet requirements due to their extreme circumstances.

K-State admissions staff also should bear in mind that Kansas high school students should have a distinct advantage in taking those windowed slots. K-State is a state-funded school, which means all Kansas residents pay for this institution. That warrants consideration for the 10-percent exception window.

The important thing for admissions counselors and high school counselors to remember is this: K-State is a great school, and everyone who works hard and proves it deserves access.

VIEWPOINT

JONATHAN KURCHE

What made it interesting was that I actually felt guilty about what I had done.

It was a Thursday afternoon, and I was under the weather — no, on my deathbed is more like it. I was sick as a dog, sick as a cat, sick as a whole host of exotic beasts you can find in a local pet shop. I was that sick — don't-touch-me-because-I-hurt-all-over sick. Sick.

So, I went to Lafene Health Center. The problem was, I was so busy with meetings I had to skip one to see a doctor. There simply was no other time in my schedule. And I felt guilty about that — that's the weird part. I had been so conditioned to believe everyone else's time was more valuable than mine, and I had committed some egregious error against my peers by not showing up at a meeting.

I don't even remember what the meeting was about. All I know is that the universe didn't cave in because I wasn't there. I know this, because if the universe had caved in, my illness wouldn't have mattered much, would it?

Maybe I'm a weenie for whining about being sick — after all, real men don't get sick. Real men don't get shot, either. If we do get sick or wind up with a bullet wound, we take a shot of whiskey and keep fighting, dammit. That's what John Wayne does, and so that's what men do. Bite the bullet, kid, take one in the leg — c'mon, it'll put hair on your chest.

Well, I have enough hair on my chest, thank you, and I get these sinus infections like you wouldn't believe. My head must be advertised as a winter vacation spot for bacteria, because come October, that's where they are — in my sinuses, in a condo with a view, hitting the $4.95 all-you-can-eat buffet, staying out late at night, and renting boats for $15-per half-hour to sail across my tender, delicate temporal mucosa.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention have made it clear that because of the looming threat of growing bacterial resistance to antibiotics, doctors should avoid creating drug-resistant strains. Doctors should not prescribe antibiotics for frivolous infections — like, say, sinus infections — because the CDC found the illness usually disappears within 10-14 days on its own.

Clearly, no one at the CDC has ever had a sinus infection.

My bacteria take up permanent residence unless I chase them off with a mangy extract from moldy bread like the CDC-is-full-of-idiots-acillin or kill-the-bacteria-before-my-head-explodes-acillin.

You get the point. I was sick, and when I started to examine why I had become sick, I somehow couldn't help but notice I had been getting a maximum of three hours of sleep that week. I also couldn't help but notice the only way I could get to the doctor was by skipping a meeting — that the only way I could have any free time was by skipping a meeting — and that somehow seemed ludicrous to me.

Now my objective is not to bitch about how busy I am. Everyone is busy. It's college, and I have no one to blame but myself for my level of involvement — after all, I could have said no, right?

Well, I came to K-State with some interest in getting involved. I will not lie, I did have some ambition. So, at first, it was something I welcomed.

"Hey, Jon, do this — you will be able to help a number of people, and it looks great on a résumé."

"Hey, Jon, do this — we want your input, because we think you have a lot to offer."

"Jon, what's your position on ..."

"Jon, you should run for this ..."

"Jon, did you ever think about ..."

The voices continued. Naturally, I didn't want to let anyone down, which is perhaps the funny part. A number of people get involved to put things on their résumé. I got involved to help my fellow students — who really only needed help with activities of marginal relevance, anyway.

One could say I succumbed to peer pressure by taking on so many tasks. The truth is, even the fastest antelope is going to have a hard time not becoming a meal in a room full of lion. We really open the floodgates at K-State. We really do our best to find a core group of students and hand them all of the titles and responsibility, while the rest of the campus, perhaps the more intelligent part, commits themselves to working on the things they want to work on — grades, recreation, girlfriends, finding a job, working on a job.

That can make us hypocrites. We say, on the one hand, grades are important while, on the other hand, activities are essential. When the two begin to conflict with one another, no adviser or group leader can offer constructive advice on which direction is best to take. Each person enthusiastically believes that their activity, academic or otherwise, is best.

What we need to begin to take to heart is that the only way to avoid falling into a pit of scholastic doom is to have a clear plan to organize and balance activities and academics before beginning at K-State.

But there is no activity adviser. We have advisers for academics, but no one to help us navigate all of the hundreds of organizations K-State offers. If activities and academics are both key for success after school, does it make sense that we have people to suggest a direction within a major, but no one to suggest a direction outside of it?

There has been discussion for a number of years about the idea of campus apathy, about the number of people going to the polls and about how dismal that number really is. The people who are voting are the same people who are involved in too many activities. They're the same people who are conditioned to give a hoot.

If we're going to bother to have student government, we need to try to make a concerted effort to correct that imbalance. Perhaps a few central advisers for activities can help us form a campus where everyone who is interested can know how to step in the right direction, how to be involved and how not to become discouraged. Activities could let the advisers know who they need, and the advisers could find those people.

It would be like junior Career and Employment Services — the campus activity service.

Maybe then a few of those voices will get what they need, and the rest of us can take our antibiotics and get some sleep.

Affirmative action short-term solution to long-term problem

Affirmative action is like putting a new paint job on a car with a burnt-out engine. New paint doesn't make the car run; it only glosses over the problem. That is what affirmative action proponents attempt to do — benefit minorities by giving them a new paint job instead of fixing the engine.

VIEWPOINT

DANEDRI THOMPSON

Part of affirmative-action logic is simple numbers. Statistics report a majority of minorities in this country live in economically disadvantaged areas. That disadvantage translates into less-than-adequate schools and fewer opportunities, and affirmative action seeks to level that playing field later with relaxed college standards and preferential hiring practices. By the time those disadvantaged minority children reach college age and affirmative action doles out "advantages," it's too late.

Affirmative action sets those minority students up for failure. Minority students have a higher college dropout rate than non-minority students, and part of the problem might be that they were never trained or expected to hack it.

California colleges, which no longer take minority status into consideration when accepting students, serve as an example of affirmative action's broken engine. California schools now accept far fewer minorities, and fewer minorities apply to their universities with the highest standards. The reason seems clear: Most minority students can't meet the same standards as their white counterparts. That is affirmative action's faulty engine. Neither of these things, the high dropout rates or fewer minority students accepted, is due to some genetic thing that makes us less smart or able, but because, statistically, a majority of us come from schools and economically depressed areas that didn't prepare us to meet those standards.

Instead of giving minorities a fresh paint job when we turn 18, spend some of the money and effort used to promote affirmative action and use it to improve schools that are less than adequate. Give us the advantage of good education earlier, so later we can compete in college and in the work force.

Affirmative action's original intent was good. Its objective was to advance equal opportunity and eliminate discrimination on the basis of race, gender, ethnic background or any other criterion that deprives people of opportunities to live and work.

Although proponents of affirmative action would say differently, it has done just the opposite and given preferential treatment to minorities and women. Part of the goal should be to make affirmative action unnecessary and obsolete. Preferential treatment, even the appearance of it, hinders that ultimate goal.

Even if affirmative action doesn't give special treatment to minorities, non-minorities perceive that it does, which creates a silent but seething mentality in some who feel they've lost opportunities due to reverse discrimination. That mentality hinges on the idea that minorities aren't as qualified for those opportunities as non-minorities. It's an idea that affirmative action perpetuates, and it gives people an excuse — though not a good one — to be racist.

I know this, because I have been a victim of affirmative action in the past. When I interviewed for a position with a federal organization, I was told a minority or a woman needed to be hired to meet affirmative-action requirements.

Lucky for them, I met both. Needless to say, I was underqualified, and I hated it. I hated knowing I was hired for my skin color, and I hated everyone else knowing the same. The other employees did not respect me, which made it even more difficult for me to perform work I wasn't qualified to do.

By the same token, I know minorities who were hired solely for their abilities, experience and qualifications. But they aren't treated with the respect they deserve, because everyone assumes they were hired to increase diversity.

In that sense, affirmative action makes minorities damned if they do and damned if they don't, because it perpetuates the myth that minorities need special treatment to get work and opportunities. It allows people to believe we aren't qualified in the first place.

To reach affirmative action's final goal of making it obsolete, two things must happen.

First, we as minorities need to raise our own standards. We need to better our schools, communities and homes. And we don't necessarily need money to do it. We only need to invest time in our children.

Second, we need to infiltrate the good-ol'-boy network. To do that, we must first establish respect by earning everything we have the old-fashioned way — hard work. Affirmative action attempts to infiltrate the network by insuring minorities are hired, but it fails when minorities are hired as tokens and never reach upper-management.

We need to establish more businesses owned by minorities, and minorities need to support those businesses. We also need to go beyond work and establish personal relationships with those in the network.

Once we've done all of these things, affirmative action no longer should be necessary. No one said it will be easy, but it can be done if we start working on the engine instead of the paint job.

Columnist's view of America fails to recognize benefits

Editor,

I recently read a column by Brandi Hertig, titled, "Money Makes the World Go Around," focusing on wealth and what she described as "gaping worldwide inequalities."

There were some interesting facts in the column, specifically about Bill Gates and how he is worth more than some countries such as Costa Rica, Guatemala and others.

It is true that Gates' wealth is obscene, and it is also true there are gaping inequalities, as there always will be.

However, there are good reasons why some countries have not achieved as much as this one individual.

Our capitalistic system in America is what has made our country what it is today.

One outlook is to view Gates enviously and suspiciously as someone who has had to have done something wrong to have achieved such great wealth.

I would prefer to view him as someone who has lead our country into the Information Age and made us a world leader in technology information.

Gates has created wealth for himself almost beyond belief. The flip-side is he has also done so for thousands of others as well, and aided, if not having been one of the primary causes of our economy becoming the envy of the entire world.

I would say to you that if there is a single reason our country has become as strong and powerful as it is, it's due to our individual freedoms and incentives to be productive for our own personal gain.

The exact incentives led Bill Gates to be worth almost $100 billion dollars.

I would also have to take issue with the statement that people like Bill Gates "have the power to help the rest of the world, but refuse to."

Gates has recently set-up the largest private philanthropic foundation in the world, and is presently equipping libraries all across the entire country with computers and Internet access. He has made the statement that it is his intention to give away his wealth, and presumably for reasons that would "help the rest of the world." Should he decide not to, that is certainly his prerogative as well, because this is America, and that's what has made America great.

There is a saying that the best way to predict the future is to create it. We should be thankful that each of us in our great country, more than anywhere else, has the opportunity to create our own future as we choose.

Our system is not perfect, and there may be a few who benefit from it to an extent greater than would seem reasonable, but it is still by anyone's measure the best in the world today. It will be a long time before someone can create a system that can top unlimited personal incentives and freedoms, regardless of how wealthy a few may become.

To say we are a "shallow, greedy country" is an unfortunate perspective for very fortunate people.

Qualified admissions to raise standards required to attend state universities

BY JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan High School students interested in attending state universities have picked up an extra period as teachers and counselors help them meet new requirements for state university admissions.

Beginning in 2001, Kansas high school students will have to meet several requirements to be accepted into a state university as part of a qualified admissions bill signed into law by Gov. Bill Graves in 1996. Kansas is the last state to incorporate a qualified admissions plan.

"There has been a philosophy that students can slack off in high school and work hard in college, but that's not true any more," said Kathy Rupp, associate director of academic affairs at the Kansas Board of Regents.

Rupp said the new curriculum needed for Kansas high school students to apply to state universities was chosen by a committee of educators throughout Kansas.

In addition to the new curriculum requirements, other requirements include meeting one of three standards: a score of 21 or higher from the American College Testing Program, a grade point average of at least 2.0 based on the regents' core curriculum or placement in the upper one-third of the graduating class. Qualified admissions includes an exception policy that will allow 10 percent of the state university's incoming class to be admitted without meeting the standards.

Rachelle Bahr, Manhattan High guidance counselor, said the core curriculum set by the board includes several classes the high school didn't require previously, such as more computer, science and math classes.

"It's a different type of class load," she said. "They need to make sure they plan to fit in an extra science class and an additional year of math."

Several teachers recently have been hired to accommodate for the extra classes, Sylvester Benson, Manhattan High principal, said.

Benson said offering a seven-period day allows students to fit in the required classes easily.

"We have not had a great deal of new curriculum," he said. "We've just expanded the number of classes offered, and we've created more room for electives."

He said some students have shown concern about the faster pace that has resulted from shorter class periods. With the added class period, there no longer is room for the seminar period, which students used for doing homework and getting help from teachers.

"The junior class feels like they have a ton of homework," said Melissa Conrad, sophomore at Manhattan High. "Without the seminar period, it's really hard."

Conrad said many students are unhappy with some of the changes.

"None of the students like the seven hours," Conrad said. "There is so much more to do now and shorter classes."

She said it is difficult fitting in time for clubs and extracurricular activities without the seminar period.

"Last year, clubs could meet during seminar," she said.

Now, clubs must have meetings after school, which makes it hard for some students to attend.

"It leaves a lot of kids out who are involved with cheerleading and sports," Conrad said. "It's really hard to keep involved."

OLEEN

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, who was against the qualified admissions bill, said she is concerned with the amount of pressure being placed on high school underclassmen by public universities.

Universities are targeting middle school and high school students early in order to gear them toward taking the required college curriculum.

Oleen said she thinks it is difficult for young students to know what they want to study in college or if a public university is the right choice for them.

"I doubt that when you're 12 you know what you're going to major in," Oleen said. "The pressure concerns me."

Benson said it is normal for students to begin their career preparations as early as middle school.

"By the time they come to ninth grade, they start to specialize and take certain courses," he said.

Oleen said because 60 percent of jobs nationwide do not require college diplomas, she worries that students will take the easy way out in high school and not pursue the required curriculum for public universities.

In addition to the new curriculum requirements, other requirements include meeting one of three standards: a score of 21 or higher from the American College Testing Program, a grade point average of at least 2.0 based on the regents' core curriculum or placement in the upper one-third of the graduating class.

Rupp said high schools in Kansas are having meetings for students and parents to make sure everyone knows the qualifications students must meet to attend a state university.

"Everyone knows what it will take to get into the universities," Rupp said. "Everyone knows what to expect. Students get into the mode of thinking about their future."

Bahr said communicating with parents at Manhattan High about the new requirements hasn't been difficult because the new requirements are not much different than Manhattan High standards.

Students at Manhattan High also are at an advantage over smaller schools because Manhattan High offers more options for completing the requirements, Rupp said.

Despite the meetings and literature sent to parents every month, Benson said some parents are worried about their children meeting the curriculum requirements and making sufficient grades for state universities.

"They're concerned about students taking the right courses," Benson said. "There are lots of concerns on the part of parents."

Students also are worried about their grades and scores, Conrad said.

"A lot of kids are worried about their ACTs now," Conrad said. "I worry about having the right kind of classes, and kids worry about their GPA."

Benson said parents also are worried that students involved with extracurricular activities such as sports and clubs will have a hard time balancing everything. He said it's important for students to have time for after-school activities as well as good grades.

"Colleges want to know test scores as well as well-roundedness, activities and leadership," he said.

K-State officials prepare for requirement change

BY JODY JOHNSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While Manhattan High School students tackle the required courses and requirements for admission to public universities, K-State and area community colleges are preparing for the changes they might face.

"Under open admissions, we were able to talk more about programs and student life," K-State Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco said. "Because of the changes, we have to make sure students understand that there is criteria to meet."

Larry Moeder, K-State director of admissions and student financial assistance, said some students attending K-State would not have met the requirements set by the qualified admissions plan, especially minority students.

He said he doesn't anticipate a big drop in enrollment numbers because each year, more and more students come to K-State with better preparation and knowledge from their high schools.

"We really don't anticipate a major effect on enrollment," Moeder said. "More and more freshman would have qualified."

Bosco said officials have looked closely at the past three freshman classes to determine how many students would have met qualifications. He said about 80 percent of freshmen students would have qualified.

"Each year, a higher percentage would have been enrolled," Bosco said.

Bosco said there is concern about minority numbers decreasing because of the admissions requirements.

"In the last three freshman classes, there was a significant difference with African-Americans meeting the criteria for admissions," he said. "We are concerned about that."

He said the 10-percent window, an exception policy that will allow 10 percent of the incoming class to be admitted without meeting the standards, will be used partly toward addressing minority numbers.

Guidelines for the 10-percent window will be decided individually by each state university, Kathy Rupp, associate director of academic affairs at the Kansas Board of Regents, said.

Moeder said he and others are beginning to establish K-State's guidelines for the window.

"We're taking a look at students who would not have met the requirements and seeing how successful they are now," he said. "If they are succeeding, we'll look also at their GPA in high school and what preparations they brought with them to K-State."

Bosco said despite the higher qualifications, which are designed to prepare students for college better, freshmen orientation classes still will be offered to help students adjust.

"These strategies will not change," he said. "The new admissions requirements mirror our student body at present. There has been no significant change in average ACT scores, retention rates or other qualifications."

Because there will be few differences in the student body once qualified admissions is in place, Bosco said there should not be any changes in the drop-out rate at K-State.

"When the dust settles, the numbers will look about the same," he said.

Moeder said he thinks dropout rates, dismissals and withdrawals among freshmen will decrease because fewer new students will find themselves overwhelmed by a college class load.

"I don't know if we'll see a dramatic reduction, but I think there will be some change," Moeder said.

Community-college officials said they are hopeful for an increased enrollment at their schools in 2001.

"The difference with us is that if somebody scores below the requirements, we would let them in, but they would have to take remedial classes," said Wynn Butler, director of leadership enhancement courses/functional area skills training and college learning and instructional programs at the Fort Riley campus of Barton County Community College.

Life goes on despite pain of Cats' loss

■ Even with NCAA title hopes gone, K-State's success in 1999 startling.

So, how 'bout those Wildcats?

OK, I guess that did sting a little. I probably should have glided into my chosen topic a little more gracefully this morning. After all, for the university's collective psyche, Saturday's 41-15 whitewashing at the hands of the hated Nebraska Cornhuskers is the most traumatic sporting event to take place since the football team's implosion last year in St. Louis. Or since Pero Vasiljevic got deported, take your pick.

People around campus seem really bummed today. The squirrels don't seem as playful as usual. Even workers from Parking Services don't have that special gleam in their eye as they bury my car beneath a small foothill of parking tickets.

Me, I'm doing well enough, given the circumstances. I try to evaluate things from the optimistic side of realism. In keeping with that, I recognize the thrashing K-State received for what it is, but I believe some good can be found in every situation, no matter how bleak.

After all, Shakespeare once wrote, "Nothing be good or bad, lest thinking upon it make it so." So, in the interests of boosting campus morale and reducing the workload of the good people at the suicide hotline, let's spend a minute assessing the positives that came out of Saturday's game.

■ At least no one died (that I'm aware of).

Hmm. That didn't fill nearly as much space as I had hoped. The stark, painful fact of the matter is that, if you're a K-State fan, there is little good to be taken out of what took place at Lincoln's Memorial Stadium this weekend. The offense was outplayed. The defense was outplayed. The coaching staff was outcoached. Nebraska all but gift wrapped the football and insisted the Wildcats take it, yet they couldn't capitalize. Other than that, things went swimmingly.

But there is one thing I think every Wildcat fan should realize about Saturday's game, score aside — K-State never should have been in that situation. Not in Lincoln, not undefeated, not in any sort of Nokia Sugar Bowl contention.

Unlike last year's squad, which was billed as a national title contender from the start, no one in their right mind thought that this year's edition would be able to see the national title contenders with a telescope by the time November arrived.

Think back to August for a second. No Michael Bishop. No Jeff Kelly. No Darnell McDonald. K-State was mired at the perimeter of the preseason top 25, and everyone was predicting 9-2, 8-3, and maybe, just maybe in contention for the Big 12 title, with a lucky break or two. Yet there they were, defying the odds, until Nebraska and its crowd and its defense and its maddening quarterback brought it all crashing down around the Wildcats' ears.

So today, as the dust continues to settle and K-State fans chuck New Orleans travel guides into trash cans across this fair state, don't mourn for the Wildcats' fallen Sugar Bowl hopes but be glad for the wild ride that K-State's undefeated start brought. Patriotism aside, as inconsistently (and downright badly, in stretches) as the Wildcats have played this year, do you realistically think they could have contended in a national title matchup? If they had to lose, better in Lincoln than on a national stage.

No, this wasn't K-State's appointed year to be a national title contender. That honor could fall to next year's team, but that's a column for another time. Instead, it now falls to this year's Wildcats to pick their intensity back up after a disheartening loss and play for consolation prizes.

The importance of K-State bouncing back this week cannot be understated. Sure, downing Missouri shouldn't take much on paper, but nor should beating Purdue in the Builders Square Alamo Bowl have been last year, and we all saw how that turned out.

A win is still vital, as there is an outside chance that Nebraska could stumble in Boulder, Colo., next week, which would land a 10-1 K-State squad in the Big 12 title game. Even if those thin odds fall through, K-State still has a shot at one of three decent postseason scenarios, but only if they finish 10-1 (and assuming Texas loses the title game, dropping to 9-3).

■ The Tostitos Fiesta Bowl. If Nebraska wins its way into a Sugar Bowl berth, or K-State somehow makes it into the Big 12 title game and wins, they likely would find themselves in this Alliance Bowl, which gets the Big 12's top at-large team.

■ The Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl. If Nebraska wins the Big 12 title game, but doesn't get into the Sugar, it would take the Fiesta berth, leaving a return to Dallas for K-State, assuming Cotton officials don't opt for home-state favorite Texas again, which is somewhat doubtful two years in a row.

■ The Plymouth Holiday Bowl. If Nebraska winds up in the Fiesta and the Cotton opts for Texas, that would drop the Wildcats down to the Big 12's third-ranked at-large bowl, to be played in San Diego.

So, with a win Saturday, K-State still could find itself playing for something worthwhile this winter. Take heart, fans and players alike. The season isn't dead yet. It might not be New Orleans, but is San Diego really that bad a place to be in January?

I couldn't have said it better myself.

Getting the hang of it

Runners claim 2nd straight regional title

STORY BY SARAH CRAIG

The K-State cross country teams have heard head coach Randy Cole talk about running as a team for a couple of months now.

He wanted to stress it so that athletes could find encouragement and friendly competition throughout the course of the race.

This weekend, the women's team finally got the hang of it. The Cats won the Midwest Regional Championship and qualified for the NCAA national meet.

They also took four of the top-five spots in the contest.

"They were very determined that they were going to take care of business and not give anyone else a chance," Cole said. "We've run pretty well this year, but we hadn't completely maxed and run our best team race of the year, so for the most part, the first-four girls were really trying to make sure that they were trying to work together and run their best race of the season."

She said she and junior Korene Hinds, who placed second, were happy they both broke the 17-minute barrier.

"It feels pretty good to have won it, and it's even better than I can share it with my teammates," Mortimer said. "I think we all feel like we raced really well. We just clicked, basically, and we all kind of stuck together and fed off each other. We went in there real relaxed and had a good time together."

The Cats returned to the field after giving up their title as Big 12 champions to Colorado.

They were, however, able to maintain the title Midwest Regional Champion for the second consecutive season.

"I feel great," Hinds said. "I feel overwhelmed. To have four in the top five and go out there as a team and race, this is the best team performance of the year."

The Cats defeated Missouri, who placed second with what Cole said he considered a quality team performance.

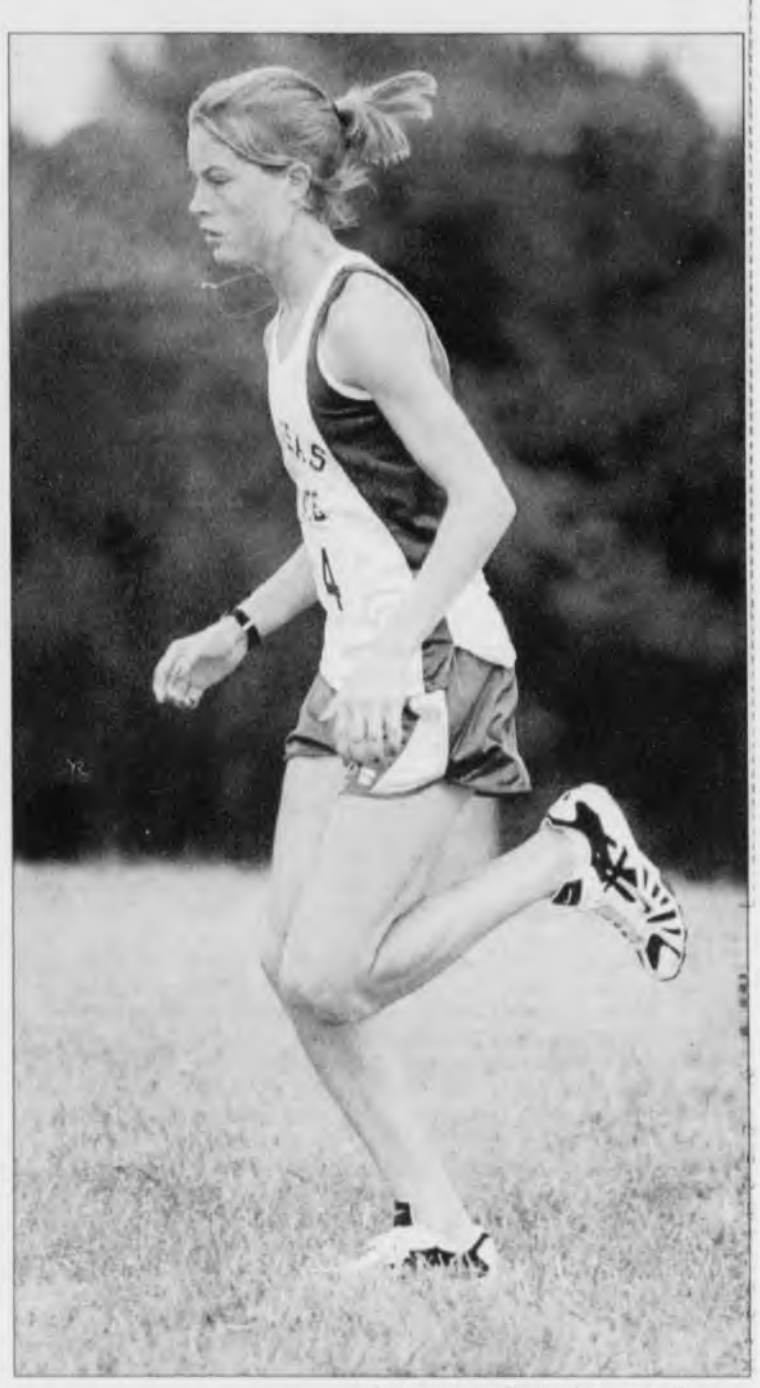
Cole said running as a team was just part of the strategy in the meet.

"I think our women worked real well together, so that about halfway through the race we had good position, and we were all right there together," Cole said. "Then it's a matter of really digging down over the last part of the course, and they did real well there. All seven of our women had good finishes."

The Cats' finish means an NCAA berth along with the top-two teams from each of the nine regions in the country. Cole said the Midwest meet added fuel to the fire.

"The outcome here validates that they are one of the best teams around so now it's just a matter of them believing they can stick with it," Cole said.

"This gives them confidence that they can race at a high level, and it shows that they're on the up-swing, and they're not running out of gas here at the end of the season."



Jean-Paul Niyongabo will be the lone representative of the K-State men's team. He qualified as an individual runner after the third team from the Midwest region was chosen as an at-large team member.

To qualify individually, a runner must be in the top-four runners from teams that did not qualify as a team.

"It's kind of tough to run as an individual, but I will just try to run my best," Niyongabo said. "I have nothing to lose and everything to gain. I think it's going to help me learn and compete with a lot of people, stronger people, and see where I'm at."

The men's team placed 12th, led by Niyongabo at seventh, then Brandon Jessop at 24th. These two, along with the women's Mortimer, Annie Wetterhus, Amanda Crouse and Hinds, earned All-Region selection.

The NCAA Championship Committee chose 13 at-large teams, both women's and men's, based on season performances. From the women's side of the Midwest region, Nebraska and Minnesota were both chosen, while on the men's side, Oklahoma State, which placed third behind Minnesota and Missouri, also was picked.

The men's basketball team opens its regular season in the first round of the Preseason National Invitation Tournament in Tucson, Ariz. against the No. 9 Arizona Wildcats tonight.

The Wildcats, who lost both preseason exhibition games this season, will be playing in their second preseason NIT. In 1994, the Cats lost to then-No. 18 Alabama, 79-48.

The Cats will feature a new look against Arizona after graduating three senior starters from last season's 20-13 squad. Filling the voids are community college transfers, mixed in with young players who could see substantial playing time. Returning for K-State are senior forwards Tony Kitt and Josh Reid, senior shooting guard Cortez Groves, sophomore forward Travis Reynolds and junior center Joe Leonard.

Against the California East All-Stars and NBC Thunder, the Cats were led offensively by Kitt and Groves, who averaged 14.5 and 12 points, respectively.

The Arizona Wildcats, who are coming off an NCAA National Tournament berth and a 22-7 overall record, return three sophomore starters in power forward Michael Wright (13.9 ppg), small forward Richard Jefferson (11.3 ppg) and shooting guard Ruben Douglas (8 ppg).

Also joining Arizona this season in a starting role is freshman Jason Gardner from Indianapolis. The 5-foot-11-inch point guard was one of the most touted point guard prospects out of high school. During his senior season, he averaged 22.6 points per game.

Last season, Arizona finished second in the Pac-10 with a 13-5 conference mark, behind Stanford.

The winner of the game will meet the winner of the New Mexico-Hofstra matchup Friday night in the second round of the NIT. The loser will be eliminated from the tournament.

Tipoff is set for 9:30 p.m. and can be viewed on ESPN2 in Manhattan.

Holloman given 2-day jail sentence for battery

■ K-State defensive tackle fined $245, will serve time over Dec. 4 weekend.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

K-State defensive tackle Cliff Holloman has been ordered to serve two days in jail for domestic battery.

Holloman, 22, was arrested Oct. 31 following what witnesses said was a fight with his girlfriend outside a Manhattan bar.

He pleaded no contest Nov. 9 in Manhattan Municipal Court and was sentenced to 30 days, but must serve only two days before he is given parole, court secretary Stacey Keller said Monday. He was also fined $245.

Holloman is to begin the sentence Dec. 4, which is also the day of the Big 12 Championship game in San Antonio. The ninth-ranked Wildcats would be in that game if they beat Missouri on Saturday and No. 4 Nebraska loses to Colorado on Nov. 26.

K-State head coach Bill Snyder said shortly after Holloman's arrest that the matter would be handled internally. Holloman's telephone number is unlisted, and he could not be located Monday night for comment.

Holloman, a junior transfer from Garden City Community College, has started eight games this season and made 31 tackles, including seven for a loss.

K-STATE'S POWER PLAYERS

This is not a scientific survey and is not representative of the student body's voice.
A list of 50 influential administrators, faculty and students was compiled by Collegian staff and then mailed to those 50 people. They were asked to select who they thought were the 10 most influential people on campus. They also were encouraged to add any names to the list that might have been left out.
Of the 50 surveys sent, 36 were returned. Here, in order, is information on the 10 most influential people on campus as determined by the surveys.

1. BILL SNYDER: HEAD FOOTBALL COACH
Snyder has coached 11 seasons at K-State, turning the football program around. His record at K-State is 95-37-1. Snyder has led his team to a 9-0 start for the second year in a row.

2. JON WEFALD: UNIVERSITY PRESIDENT
Wefald has had the position since July 1986. Since that time, he has worked to maximize the university's resources. He has worked diligently to improve the library, and he has played a role in the university's football success. In 13 years as president, Wefald has worked to increase library funding as well.

3. BOB KRAUSE: VICE PRESIDENT OF INSTITUTIONAL ADVANCEMENT
Krause works closely to oversee many of the university's departments. He coordinates activities with the KSU Alumni Association and the KSU Foundation.

4. JASON HEINRICH: STUDENT BODY PRESIDENT
Heinrich works to create legislation for the student body. Heinrich oversees a cabinet and he represents and protects the rights and interests of the student body. He approves or vetoes Student Senate legislation. He also is part of the Student Advisory Committee for the Board of Regents.

5. PAT BOSCO: DEAN OF STUDENT LIFE
Bosco is in charge of admissions and recruitment for the university. He oversees activities affecting students, including Greek Affairs and student-life programming. He has received numerous service and leadership awards, and has received the Service to Students award from the university.

6. JAMES COFFMAN: PROVOST
Coffman is the chief academic and program officer for K-State. He works with teaching, research, service and extension programs. He also is the university's representative to the Regents' Council of Chief of Academic Officers.

7. SUE PETERSON: ASSISTANT TO THE UNIVERSITY PRESIDENT
Peterson works closely with the Kansas Board of Regents. In her position, she is responsible for all K-State activities involving the congressional delegation. She also is in charge of coordinating communication between K-State and state and federal governments. Peterson is a member of the president's staff.

8. MORDEAN TAYLOR-ARCHER: ASSOCIATE PROVOST DIVERSITY AND DUAL CAREER DEVELOPMENT
Taylor-Archer oversees the multicultural arm of the university and is an advocate for multicultural issues on campus.

9. MAX URICK: ATHLETIC DIRECTOR
In the world of intercollegiate athletics at K-State, the buck stops with Max Urick. His daily responsibilities include supervision of coaches. He is responsible for maintaining fiscal control over revenues, and he ensures that the department supports itself. Recently, Urick supervised the university's expansion of its football stadium, as well as a new baseball stadium.

10. JAKE WORCESTER: STUDENT SENATE CHAIR
Worcester can call special meetings if 10 percent of the student body signs a petition. He was elected last year, and is in charge of running Student Senate meetings.

POWER

Student Senate or one of its committees.

"The Student Senate is totally empowered to govern its own affairs," he said. "I always have stressed empowerment at Kansas State University. Our goal has been to hire the best and brightest people."

He said empowerment will continue to be the core of the Wefald administration. He said changing the structure would be difficult because it has transcended throughout the university.

"I think what we have done is embed this power theme into the culture," he said.

Student Body President Jason Heinrich said some decisions have a greater effect on faculty and administrators than students, because students are more transient in the community.

He said students are customers of K-State, and that the university should be responsive to student needs. Heinrich said the current structure of shared governance between administrators, faculty and students functions well at K-State.

"It's the administration and the faculty who are the ones that are institutionalized," he said. "I do appreciate the fact that they are willing to include students on campus in most decisions."

Heinrich said maintaining a balance of power requires constant communication and sharing ideas, which is evident in the struggle to provide adequate funding for Hale Library.

He said a team concept exists at K-State. Although the physical structure of power at the university shares many similarities with other institutions, K-State offers a greater degree of shared governance, giving students the ability to make changes on campus.

"I am satisfied with the way things are going," he said. "I feel like students are involved in the decisions that affect them on campus."

Faculty Senate President Marion Gray said involvement in campus decisions also extends to university faculty. Gray said additions to the university handbook related to curriculum and faculty employment require approval from Faculty Senate.

Top administrators and Faculty Senate leaders also meet monthly to discuss campus issues.

"We don't always agree, but we hear one another and work hard on trying to arrive at a shared consensus on important matters," Gray said.

Although faculty and administration both want the best for K-State, he said each has a different perspective of university concerns.

Gray said faculty concerns usually stem from academic integrity, whereas administration works to operate under a budget and maintain a positive public image for K-State.

"We need to continue to have very strong Faculty Senate leadership," he said. "We need to ensure our administrators are people who share this view that shared governance is important."

The Council of Faculty Senate Presidents, which represents the Faculty Senate of each Kansas Board of Regents university, is drafting a proposal to present to the regents that would keep the idea of shared governance in the regent system. The proposal would establish a policy requiring a search committee to consider shared governance when hiring university presidents.

> "The best university is one where everyone is involved in all issues, and they can learn from one another."
> — Marion Gray, Faculty Senate President

For example, Gray said, when Wefald retires as university president, the regents would look at each job candidate's position on shared governance for the university.

"We try to keep the communication going, but I want to enhance it," Gray said. "The best university is one where everyone is involved in all issues, and they can learn from one another."

Keeping students involved in the decision-making process also is fundamental when making campus decisions, Gray said.

Heinrich will make a presentation to Faculty Senate this month. Gray said he and Heinrich are working together to establish better communication between Faculty and Student senate.

"It's very important to hear a student voice in important decisions," he said. "They experience the university from their own perspective and know what is going on to a great degree. They have a vital stake in the policy of the university."

But not every campus organization is content with the university's structure of power.

Classified Senate President Diana Dean said opinions of classified employees often remain unheard. She said classified employees — which include custodians, carpenters, some secretaries and other employees — are left out of campus decisions.

"We need to meet together and discuss the way things are done on campus," Dean said. "The classified employees are obviously a major part of the university, and we currently have little voice on campus."

As state employees, Classified Senate works with other universities in the Kansas Board of Regents system to bring concerns to the Kansas Legislature, rather than the regents. She said goals of Classified Senate are increased pay and changing a rule that allows only cost-of-living pay increases after 13 years of employment.

She said Faculty Senate, Student Senate and Classified Senate should work together to bring a louder voice to K-State.

"We are not asked to be on any committees. We are on some planning committees, but there are different committees we are not on," she said. "We don't know what Faculty Senate and Student Senate are doing. There are different things we are working on that the students are working on, too. If the three senates worked together, it would be a bigger voice."

League brings out hometown heroes each week at municipal auditorium

BY MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Featuring less-than-suffocating man-to-man defenses and high scoring offenses, the city men's league might produce some hometown heroes for Manhattan basketball fans.

Every Monday and Thursday evening, area men ages 18 through 50 gather at Manhattan Municipal Auditorium to play basketball.

The 24 teams are organized into four divisions based on playing abilities. The teams' first two games, which took place last night, decided what division they will play in.

"Some games this week are kind of blowouts because we're not really sure about how good the teams are," said Clint Freeman, senior in park resources management.

The teams play in their divisions during the regular season, and tournaments determine division winners. The winners of each division earn the chance to play in a tournament at the end of the season to decide the overall champion.

For most players though, simply being able to play and enjoy the game is most important.

"It's fun to get into a more organized situation where the stakes are a little higher," Jaret Wohler, senior in agribusiness, said.

Wohler, who plays with his brother Jon, said the level of competition in the league, even though some players are old enough to be other players' fathers, is also an important drawing card.

"The older guys play pretty well," Jaret Wohler said. "The ones that play usually are crafty enough and shoot well enough to make up for their speed. Our dad even played last year, and he's about 49."

Having older guys in the league often changes the type of play, Jovan Wilhoite, league player, said.

"I expect it to be physical because you're playing with a lot of older people," Wilhoite said. "I'm only 18, and most older people are physical players."

The athletes range in skill, Jaret Wohler said. Most were high school players, and some even played basketball at a community college. Jaret Wohler said the overall caliber of athletes is fairly equal from team to team.

"Usually every team has their standouts, but there aren't any players that really dominate," Jon Wohler said.

Teams play 10 minute quarters and have a five minute respite at half time. Breaks in action during free throws, occasions for encouragement and talk in the beginning of the game are replaced with panting in the fourth quarter.

Referees usually keep the game relatively clean, Jon Wohler said.

"We played in the Abilene city league, and the referee there just let it go," Jon Wohler said.

"You come here, and it's much better refereeing."

Even the referees are there for the fun of it.

"I used to play, and I enjoy it," said Stephanie Duerksen, sophomore in pre-professional elementary education.

In the end, the players are given a chance to test their skills against talented competition and just have fun, Jon Wohler said.

Governments begin to discuss anti-doping initiatives at Olympic summit

BY MIKE CORDER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SYDNEY, Australia — The White House drug czar and Olympic officials feuded Monday over a new agency aimed at fighting doping by athletes in a row that clouded the opening of a summit here on drugs in sports.

Barry R. McCaffrey, the top drug adviser to President Clinton, said the new World Anti-Doping Agency — known as WADA — is too closely linked to the International Olympic Committee, and that the United States could not take part in the venture as it stands.

"It looks to us as though it will be dominated by the IOC. That, to us, is unacceptable," McCaffrey said on the opening day of the three-day summit.

Olympics officials angrily denied the criticism.

"Contrary to some public criticism, its structure ensures that it is truly independent of any particular sport or organization," IOC vice president Kevan Gosper assured delegates from 26 nations.

John Coates, president of the Australian Olympic Committee, called McCaffrey no friend of the Olympic movement and tried to stop him from taking a tour Sunday through Sydney's 2000 Olympics complex. Sydney officials, however, permitted the tour.

Gosper told Australian Broadcasting Corp. radio that McCaffrey was basing his attacks on outdated information.

"I think that the United States has not really kept fully in touch with developments that have taken place," Gosper said.

The World Anti-Doping Agency, created Nov. 10 by the IOC, will have representatives from sports bodies, including the IOC, on its board as well as government officials.

The IOC will have four seats on the agency's board, which can have up to 35 members.

The body's first chairman is IOC vice president Dick Pound and it is provisionally based in Lausanne, Switzerland, home of the international Olympic movement.

On Sunday, McCaffrey said there was a fundamental conflict on interest in the IOC running both the anti-doping agency and the Olympics.

Prince Alexandre de Merode, chairman of the IOC medical committee, called McCaffrey's response hysterical and not constructive.

The IOC invited McCaffrey to Switzerland as soon as possible to meet with IOC President Juan Antonio Samranch regarding a mutually agreed upon agenda.

Samaranch is not attending the Sydney conference.

The dispute has overshadowed other issues at the Sydney summit, which gathers anti-doping experts in talks on how governments can cooperate to help in the fight against performance-enhancing drugs in sport.

Australian organizers said they want delegates to commit to agreed standards in doping control and improve international cooperation and collaboration through bilateral and multilateral anti-doping agreements.

The summit is scheduled to end Wednesday.

"Too much responsibility."

I mean, who wants all the pressure of running a business? That was my first reaction to being a College Pro manager.

College Pro provides all the training and support you need, so I started thinking – why not be challenged? Do something that will give you real hands-on management experience. Get skills you'll be able to use for the rest of your life. And have the chance to earn a lot more than you ever could at most 'summer jobs.'

I figured I had nothing to lose by checking out the Web site. So I did. Turns out it was the kind of responsibility I was looking for... and exactly what I was ready for.

Taming your tuition TROUBLES

Workshop tonight to teach students ways to receive scholarships, aid

By KRISTEN DYMACEK
Kansas State Collegian

Students concerned about how they are going to pay next year's tuition can attend the Financial Aid and Scholarship Workshop from 6 to 8 p.m. tonight in the K-State Student Union.

The workshop, co-sponsored by Adult Student Services and Student Financial Assistance, is offering students a chance to fill out applications and ask the experts any questions they might have about financial aid, said Larry Moeder, director of admissions and student financial assistance.

"It's our effort in helping current K-State students apply for scholarships," Moeder said. "The whole application process tends to be frustrating and confusing. We want to do everything we can to simplify the process."

He said many students don't realize they can apply for financial aid or don't completely understand how the application process works.

"Every single student can qualify for some sort of financial assistance," Moeder said.

Jack Taylor, assistant director of student financial assistance and undergraduate admissions, said the workshop is split into two sections. From 6 to 7 p.m., there will be a browsing expo center in the Union Courtyard.

"All colleges and organizations will have tables for students to stop by and find out about scholarship opportunities," Taylor said.

Moeder said students can apply for national scholarships as well as K-State scholarships.

"There are millions of scholarship dollars around the country in national scholarships," he said.

Taylor said financial aid handouts and information will be available for students to pick up. Computers also will be set up for students to do online scholarship searches, with student workers available to assist them in the application process.

Between 7 and 8 p.m., there will be a formal session in Forum Hall. Four speakers will address financial aid topics, including how to search for scholarships and how to answer scholarship essay questions.

Moeder said students should be prepared to ask questions.

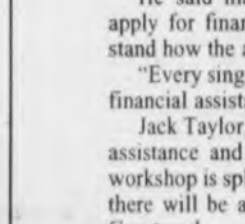
"They should be ready to ask representatives about the criteria for qualifying for particular scholarships," he said. "They should also ask how much money they should expect to receive from the financial aid program."

Moeder said students should be aware of the responsibilities and obligations of being a student loan borrower.

Taylor agreed that students should be aware of the type of loan, the interest on the loan, the payment plan and how long it will take to pay off the loan.

Amy Abitz, freshman in psychology and public relations, said she plans to attend the workshop.

"I'm going for some general information," Abitz said.



"I'm losing a scholarship, so hopefully I'll be able to pick up another one at the workshop."

She said having the workshop at the Union will make it more accessible for the students and easier to get information about financial aid.

Moeder said that is what the workshop wants to achieve.

"The students should consider it as a resource available to them to help them through a complicated, but necessary process," he said.

IPO investments require research for validity, goals

Initial public offerings are the method by which private or new companies sell shares of their stock to the general public, raising funds for product development, plant expansion or other purposes.

IPOs have a reputation for being easy routes to wealth, and in the world of Internet IPOs, where enthusiasm for a new issue is often inconsistent with the company's true prospects, many have made overnight fortunes by "getting in on the ground floor" through IPOs. As a result, IPOs tend to be limited in availability — few small investors have the chance to participate at the offering price — and also tend to be a favorite route of less-savory individuals to cheat people out of investment money.

Not all IPOs are available only to institutional or preferred investors. Every year, a number of companies go public using one of the Securities and Exchange Commission's special rules, which permits small public offerings without the burdensome requirements of full registration. These offerings are usually locally advertised in newspapers or trade magazines. These types of "self-managed" IPOs, where a company is selling stock directly to the public, are accessible to the small investor, and many times the minimum initial investment is rather small, sometimes as low as $250.

However, the reputation of IPOs as easy money has resulted in a plethora of investment schemes, that are either speculative to the far reaches of the moon or simply outright scams. As much as the SEC does to stop such activities, the hunger for quick profits lures millions of dollars out of investor's pockets annually, never to be seen again. As a result, self-managed IPO investments often require a higher degree of research than investing in established companies.

The first step in assessing the validity of a company in a self-managed IPO is checking the company's federal and state registrations. All stock offerings, regardless of size, are required to file a form with the SEC in Washington, D.C., with basic information on the offering.

Most individual states also require businesses to register with the Secretary of State's office prior to commencement of business and sometimes also with the securities division of that office. While some companies at the center of investment scams are registered with these agencies, the absence of such a registration should indicate something is not quite right.

Once you request information consider a number of factors present in the data. First, never be fooled by the appearance of the company's offering circular, an information booklet that describes the purpose and intent of the business.

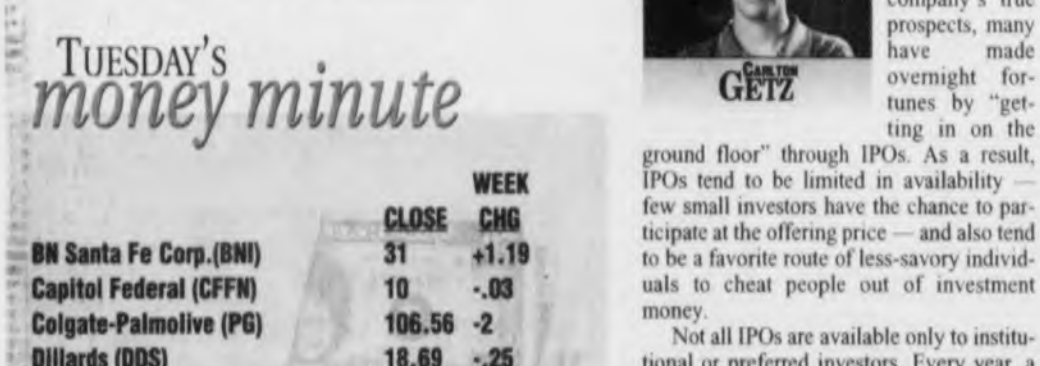
Many investment scams will spare no expense in creating a professional-looking bound offering circular to reinforce the confidence of potential investors. Alternately, you should never rule out a potential investment by its offering circular: Some circulars that are simply photocopied and stapled in the corner indicate frugality rather than a cheap attempt to cheat people.

Look closely at the credentials of the people involved in the offering. Every offering circular should contain information on the experience and employment history of the individuals who will serve as executive officers. Do their credentials match the purpose of the business? Do they have sufficient experience to get the job done? Are there any red flags that should be identified? One offering circular I saw noted that two of the proposed executive officers had signed consent decrees with the SEC. These decrees, although often admitting no guilt, indicate that the SEC once thought these individuals violated the ethics of the securities business and paid a fine.

Always pay close attention to the business plan and the proposed capital structure, even if only in its most simplistic terms. Is the company committing sufficient funds to fulfill the company's objectives? Another offering circular I reviewed several years ago for a $2 million IPO noted that the company intended to pay $400,000 a year to its five executive officers, yet stated the product likely would require at least two years to develop.

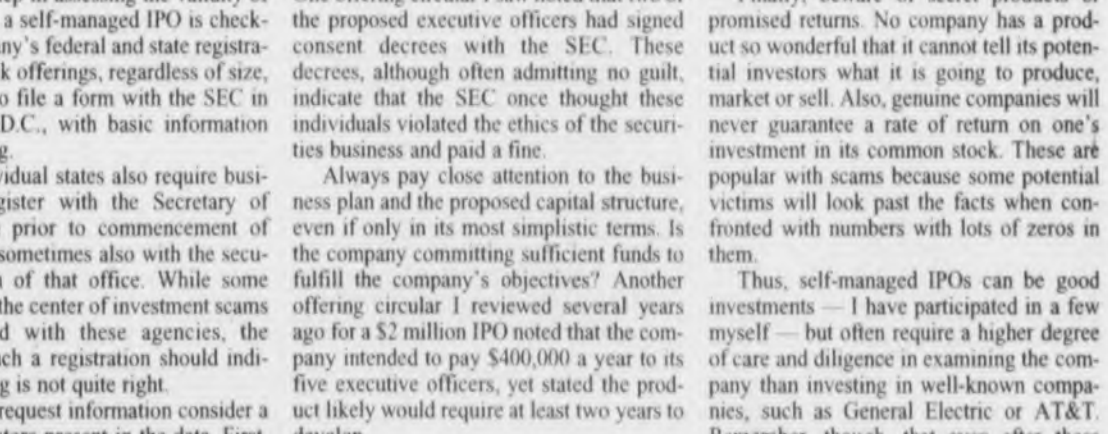
Thus, at the earliest date the company could have anything marketable, half the funds raised would have been paid to the company's officers. As a software company, this might have been understandable if they had programming or other experience but these individuals did not.

Try calling the company, or if the offering circular mentions suppliers/customers/partners, call these individuals to check on reliability and working history of the company. Be wary of "phantom" companies that are mentioned solely to provide a convenient and usually positive reference. Some scams will mention well-known companies to build confidence, such as Wal-Mart. If you can't find anyone at Wal-Mart familiar with the company, ask the IPO company for its contact at Wal-Mart. Alternately, many IPOs will have legal advisers or accountants who also can provide references.



Finally, beware of secret products or promised returns. No company has a product so wonderful that it cannot tell its potential investors what it is going to produce, market or sell. Also, genuine companies will never guarantee a rate of return on one's investment in its common stock. These are popular with scams because some potential victims will look past the facts when confronted with numbers with lots of zeros in them.

Thus, self-managed IPOs can be good investments — I have participated in a few myself — but often require a higher degree of care and diligence in examining the company than investing in well-known companies, such as General Electric or AT&T. Remember, though, that even after these tests you still must judge the investment quality of the company itself before investing.



Only commit your investments to companies in which you have a reasonable degree of confidence in.

Dillons' marketing plan receives mixed feedback

■ Some customers not fond of store's new loyalty cards.

BY SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new marketing strategy of Dillons Food Stores is under way in Manhattan and receiving mixed feedback from local customers.

The strategy comes in the form of a loyalty card. Customers can apply for the card free of charge, but they must have the card with them at the register to receive store savings.

Dennis Gaschler, spokesman for Dillons, said the card was designed with customers' best interests in mind.

"This offers customers better savings and customer values," he said.

The card also has a tracking device that tracks buying patterns of customers.

James Giebler, loyalty marketing manager, said the tracking device will benefit customers.

"This tracks behavior which we would use to market things that customers buy," he said.

"For example, if there is a portion of people that buy lots of baby products, we might send them discounts for these sort of products."

Gaschler said Dillons will not release any information to outside merchants.

The card hit Kansas Dillons stores in early August, with Salina and McPherson stores kicking off the program. By mid-December, all 71 stores in Kansas will have implemented the gimmick, Giebler said.

Jeremy Rogge, K-State alumnus and Salina resident, said he is not in favor of the new card.

"It's a nuisance and a pain," he said. "I don't understand. It was working fine without it.

"I don't understand why they don't just put it on sale so everyone can get the savings," he said.

Rogge said he thought the timing of the card was suspicious.

"They came out right when the Wal-Mart Supercenter was opened," he said. "Dillons has lost a lot of business. It's an awful lot quieter there."

The card's inconvenience outweighs its potential savings, Rogge said.

"I've hardly stepped foot in Dillons since the Supercenter opened," he said. "It's a pain to use the cards.

"Here, the card deters people from going to Dillons," he said.

Brenon Odle, senior in political science, said he, too, does not like the system.

"It's a rip," he said. "They mislead you."

Odle said he has no intention of applying for a card.

"If some guy buys 500 pounds of ice cream every month, they don't need to know about that," he said. "It's a lazy way for them to keep inventory."

That might be the case for some, but Gaschler said overall the card has been met with approval.

"We've had a great response," he said. "It's meeting our expectations."

Plans are in the making to extend promotions, Gaschler said.

"As this program evolves, we'll be offering other incentives," he said.

Dillons will look into creating a sweepstakes program, a point system that will award customers who reach a certain number of points based on products bought, and discounts with other statewide merchants, he said.

"Price discounts are only the beginning of this program," Giebler said.

COMPARING PRICES

UN-AMERICAN

Attention upstanding citizens!!!!

Be warned that a new form of radio -- digital crack is more like it -- is about to be unleashed upon an unsuspecting nation. Called Live365.com, it is nothing less than a plot to lure an entire generation of young hearts and minds into an incredibly hypnotic world of sonic addiction.
Once they've got us hooked, the powers-that-be will start pumping the happy juice into the water supply and using our fillings to manipulate our brain waves.

FACT 2

Live365.com is FREE to broadcasters and listeners alike.
Hmmm, can you think of any other place where everything is free? Say, Russia for example!!!!

Live365.com is many times more powerful than regular radio!!!!!!!!
Regular radio plays the same music over and over and has big blocks of commercials to break everything up. There's no way you can listen to it for any extended period.
Live365.com, on the other hand, has a ungodly amount of stations with something for everyone. Any time, day or night. Plus, they even let you broadcast your own radio. With no license and no rules.
Probability of moral decay??? 100%!!!

Live365.com begins with the word live and live spelled backwards is evil!!!

FOUQUET

The sacrifices

Fouquet said she also must sacrifice many things so that she is able to balance the demands of college with those of her 4-year-old. She no longer has time for activities a typical college student takes for granted, such as belonging to organizations, going out with friends and spending time in Aggieville.

"I pretty much give up all my hobbies, everything I like to do," she said. "Right now I belong to one organization, but if I was an undergrad or if I didn't have a child, I'd probably belong to as many things as I could. Moneywise, I give up pretty much everything. I don't buy clothes. You don't buy snack food. You just don't do a lot of things."

The one organization Fouquet is involved in is the speech and hearing club, of which she is the president. However, she said she is trying to begin a support group for parents residing at Jardine. The group will help to set up a trade babysitting program, in which each family is responsible for the children of other group members one night a week, allowing parents a chance to have some time alone.

"We also decided that we were going to talk about issues we were concerned about, and we talked about getting key speakers in about nutrition, or discipline or whatever we're having trouble with," she said.

Life at Jardine

Fouquet said living in the Jardine apartments has been a positive experience for both Tim and herself.

"There are lots of kids," she said. "It's real diverse, and a good learning environment. He picks up several different languages. He can't speak them fluently, but he's picked up different words. All his friends are from different countries."

Fouquet's son, as well as many of the other children living at the Jardine complex, also have picked up a desire to learn from their parents.

"It's kind of funny, because if I sit down and start doing my homework, he'll be like, 'Mom, I gotta do my homework,' or 'I gotta study,' so I think it sends him the message to work hard for what you have. He always wants to do his homework, or he wants to work on the computer, because I work on the computer. I definitely think it sends him the right message," she said.

Fouquet said the Jardine complex not only is a good learning environment for its children, but it also tries to make life easier for its parents.

"In addition to providing an opportunity for them to live on campus and go to school, which is our main role, we can also provide meal plans for them," Stephanie Bannister, Jardine Apartments coordinator, said.

Jardine also provides monthly programming for residents of the entire complex, which is aimed at focusing on families or people with young children.

"In September, we did a safety night program," Bannister said. "That focused on child carseats, bike helmets, the importance of washing your hands, never leaving your children alone, home safety, basic first-aid and CPR, just so they would have an understanding of things that were important to know.

"Around the holidays, we have a residence council that will host a holiday party for the children."

Bannister said Jardine also tries to help parents by providing breakfast on some mornings.

"Sometimes when you are trying to get out the door, you have a kid and you need to get out the door, breakfast isn't always something that happens," she said.

The complex also tries to offer a safe environment for children. Wash houses are locked 24 hours a day.

"Even our facilities have children in mind," Bannister said. "Anytime we do any type of project, we try to make sure we take a lot of precautions for smaller residents."

Fouquet said Timothy is a blessing in her life, not only because he is her child, but he is the reason that she is on her current path.

"Of course, I would have liked to do things in the right order, but I can't guarantee that that's the road I would have taken if I didn't have Tim to support and look after and take care of and plan for," she said. "So, it's probably a good thing that he came around when he did."

CHINA

benefits of the agreement, Congress must vote to grant China permanent normal trading relations with the United States, ending the annual congressional vote on tariff rates for Chinese imports.

"The fevered rush to admit China to the WTO is a grave mistake," AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said in a statement. "It is disgustingly hypocritical of the Clinton administration to pledge to 'put a human face on the global economy' while prostrating itself in pursuit of a trade deal with a rogue nation that decorates itself in human rights abuses."

Teamsters union president James P. Hoffa called the deal a slap in the face to American and Chinese workers. The American Textile Manufacturers Institute, an industry trade group, contended the deal could result in the loss of 150,000 American textile and apparel manufacturing jobs.

The American negotiating team, led by U.S. Trade Representative Charlene Barshefsky and by Gene Sperling, the president's chief economic adviser, insisted they had struck a deal that would result in significant gains for American exporters while retaining protections for threatened U.S. industries such as textiles.

Under the deal reached Monday, China agreed to reduce its tariffs on U.S. goods from an overall average of 22.1 percent down to 17 percent with even bigger reductions on certain farm products. China agreed to cut its barriers limiting sales of American wheat, corn, rice and cotton.

The Chinese also promised to lower barriers that now seriously hinder the ability of U.S. companies to do business in China in the areas of banking, insurance, securities and telecommunications. The American movie industry would see an increase in the number of films it can export annually and U.S. firms won the right to offer auto loans in China.

However, the Chinese were unwilling to go back to an April offer to allow U.S. firms to have 51 percent majority ownership in telecommunications companies.

percent.

Also, the United Nations would have to maintain its spending at current levels.

"Great nations meet their responsibilities, and I am determined that we will meet ours," Clinton said last month as he promised to fight for payment of the back dues.

Replying to criticism of the compromise, which would deny U.S. grants to international family planning organizations if they promoted abortion rights, Albright said the impact would be minimal.

Actually, the budget deal, which still requires final congressional approval, prohibits grants to groups that spend more than $15 million, a figure the groups do not exceed currently.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., an abortion-rights supporter, said the deal "is not a compromise. It is a capitulation." But in a statement, she stopped short of saying she would vote against it, saying of Republicans, "They gave the president no choice. We have to pay our dues to the U.N."

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., also expressed concern.

"We know we need to do more for family planning, not punish those who perform the important service of family planning around the world," she said.

Boxer added, "The fact that our national security would be held hostage by the most radical elements in the Congress is shocking to me, and I think it is shocking to the world."

But Rep. Benjamin A. Gilman, R-N.Y., the chairman of the House International Relations Commitee, said of the compromise, "At least for the next year it will take care of the arrearages that have been long overdue in payment."

U.S. influence at the United Nations is based largely on America's status as the world's only remaining superpower. The nation's permanent Security Council seat was not in jeopardy. Still, Clinton, Albright and other senior administration officials had feared that welching on dues would reduce U.S. influence and even humiliate the government.

STANDARDS

Butler said students who struggle with regents qualifications will have to enroll in non-credit developmental classes to make sure they're prepared for college.

Lori Crowther, director of admissions at BCCC in Great Bend, said she doesn't anticipate much change in enrollment on the community-college level, but she said she hopes students who don't qualify for public-university admission will consider community colleges.

"We hope they'll look to community college to further their educations," Crowther said, "but the qualifications are not very stringent, and a lot of students heading toward college probably fit within the levels required."

Bosco said he thinks some high school students won't try to meet the new requirements.

"There will be a group of students who will simply stop when they hear there's admission criteria," he said. "There will be an intimidation factor for a group of students."

Bosco said the intimidation factor will cause students to look toward community colleges.

"Their enrollment will go through the roof," he said.

Students who don't qualify might choose to attend community college for a year or two, then transfer to a state university when they're better prepared, said Pat Altwig, director of student services at the Geary County campus of Cloud County Community College.

"Many students transfer to K-State," Altwig said. "When they're ready to transfer, they're better students for Kansas State."

Bosco said students who don't qualify in high school can apply to transfer to K-State after completing 24 hours at a community college with at least a 2.0 GPA.

Once students are 21 years old, they will be assessed for acceptance at K-State without consideration of the qualified admissions requirements, he said.

Jerome Letourneau, CCCC dean of student services, said the new requirements might act as a guide for some students.

He said students who fail to meet the requirements might not be cut out for public university life and might be more comfortable at a smaller community college closer to home.

"Academics isn't the main reason people go to community colleges," Letourneau said. "For students to do well any place, they have to be secure."

Israel plans further withdrawal from West Bank despite dispute

BY LAURIE COPANS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TEL AVIV, Israel — A planned Israeli pullout from more West Bank land was in question Sunday amid a dispute between Israel and the Palestinians over what areas should be included in the handover.

The Israel troop withdrawal from 5 percent more of the West Bank was planned for Monday. But late the evening before, the Palestinians had yet to approve the redeployment maps, demanding that the areas to be transferred include more population centers.

The dispute came as the American envoy to the peace talks, Dennis Ross, headed to the region to meet with negotiators, who could have more talks late Sunday.

Israeli officials said they were ready to redeploy, and insisted they could do so without Palestinian agreement. However, the Palestinians said they rejected a unilateral pullout.

Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was confering with his negotiators late into the evening. Israeli and Palestinian negotiators could have further talks late Sunday in an effort to resolve the issue.

Israel's internal security minister, Shlomo Ben-Ami, said Israel had shown the withdrawal maps to the Palestinians, and that he expected the pullout to go smoothly.

By today Israel will never have handed over the 5 percent of the West Bank, Ben-Ami said.

The withdrawal will be the second of three pullouts mandated by the Sharm el-Sheik agreement signed in September. By January, the Palestinians will have full or partial control of 39 percent of the West Bank.

Israel's chief negotiator, Oded Eran, said the Palestinian request would not be considered for this withdrawal.

"We can look at their request for the next (third) phase of redeployment," he said.

An Israeli military official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that several thousand Palestinians live in areas that will be part of Monday's transfer.

Israeli and Palestinian negotiators did agree Sunday on an agenda for the final status talks, the last phase of the peace process. The talks began last week.

During final status talks, the sides hope to reach agreement on the disputes over Jerusalem, water sources, the fate of Palestinian refugees, Jewish settlements, and the final borders between Israel and the Palestinian entity, said Palestinian negotiator Yasser Abed Rabbo.

The sides have set an ambitious schedule, aiming for a framework for a final agreement by February and a complete accord by September.

Meanwhile, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, on a four-day trade mission in Israel, declined to visit any Palestinian areas — avoiding the kind of political flap that ensnared First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton during a trip to the West Bank last week.

"We are not here on any political basis," Bush told Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak on Sunday. He said U.S. Embassy officials had asked him to visit the Palestinians, but he declined, saying Israel was the focus of his trip.

Fire fighters respond to fire outside Hale Library Monday

A spark from welding ignited leaves outside an air-intake duct of Hale Library on Monday.

The duct is located on the northeast corner of the library.

The smoke from the small fire went directly to a server room in the library.

Chad Harp, Computing and Network Services employee, said an intern notified him about the smell of smoke. Harp said he called campus police.

One of the firefighters with the Manhattan Fire Department who arrived on the scene said the air intakes for the library took smoke right into the building.

The spark that fueled the small fire was from the welding of a new iron gate that Ron Leeson, welder for K-State facilities, was installing. Leeson said he saw the fire department arrive and immediately brought them to where he was working.

"It turns out it's just leaves," Harp said.

2 K-State alumni to create College of Business awards

Students and instructors in the College of Business Administration soon will have the opportunity to recieve two new awards.

William Barbe of Greenwich, Conn., a K-State business alumnus, committed $75,000 to endow the Barbe Family Scholarship.

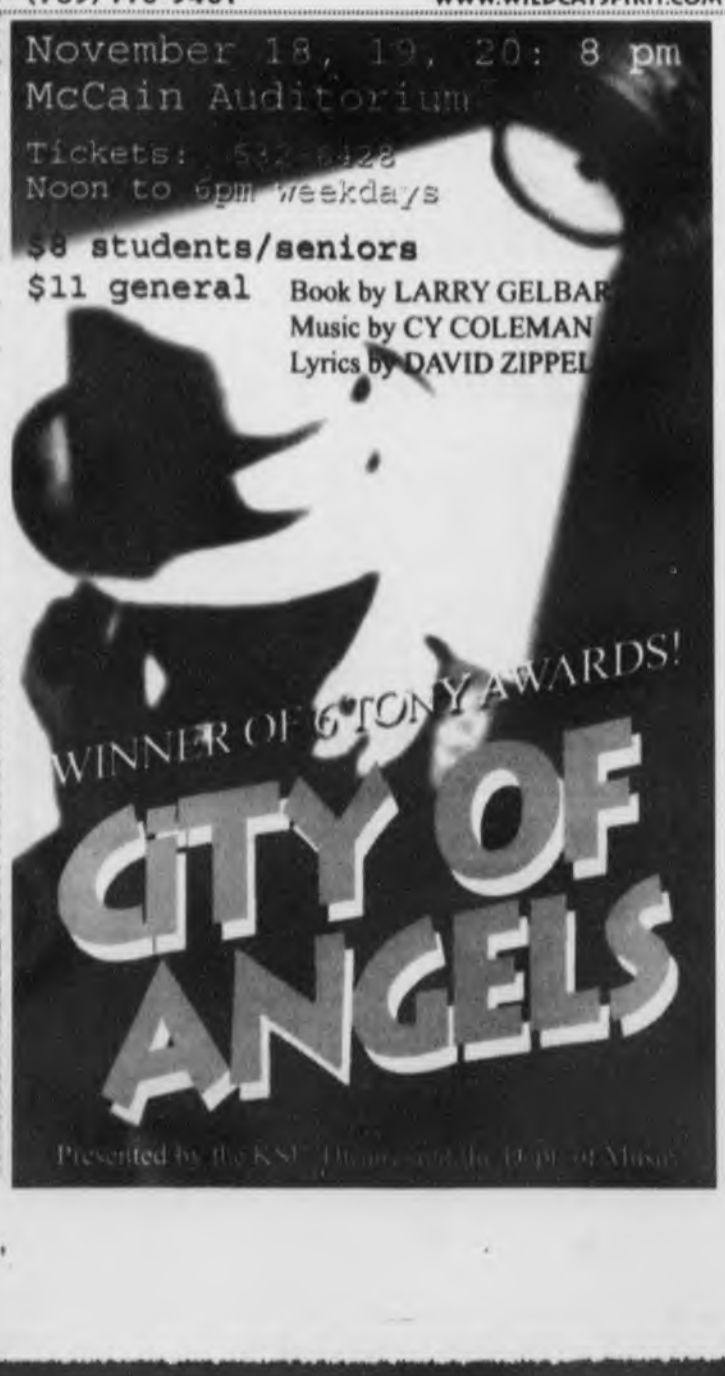
The minimum award amount will be $1,250 each year.

Another K-State alumnus has created a business fellowship that will be awarded annually to an instructor in the college.

George K. Baum & Co., Kansas City, Mo., pledged $90,000 to the KSU Foundation to establish the George K. Baum and Company Faculty Fellowship.

Each award will be at least $5,000.

K-State educational group receives national affiliation



The National Council on Economic Education has given K-State's Center for Economic Education a five-year full affiliation status with the council.

The K-State Center had to demonstrate it effectively delivers economic education to earn the affiliation.

The center designs programs to enhance economic understanding, such as the Stock Market Game and LifeSmarts.

Architecture exhibit's creator to visit K-State

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An architect who challenged traditional views and uses of architecture within his lifetime will be honored by a series of events Wednesday.

The Department of Architecture and the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art will sponsor a symposium concerning the work of Louis I. Kahn.

"It'll address issues that have come from his work, and that are relevant to his work," Mark Shapiro, professor of architecture, said.

Four speakers, all of whom were involved with Kahn during his lifetime — working with him and his firm or on his Kansas City, Mo., project — will take the podium at 7 p.m. Wednesday in the K-State Student Union's Little Theatre.

Kahn's plans for the Kansas City project are on display at the Beach art museum through Nov. 28, and are titled "The Sense of the City." The exhibit is a collection of blueprints, sketches and models that would have created a high-rise office building in Kansas City that challenged traditional views of architecture. Kahn, who died in 1974, believed that a building should not simply be a place of work, but that it should inspire loyalty to the city.

"He was the first one who saw architecture in a new light," said Breea Rayner, public relations marketing intern for the museum.

Rayner said Kahn's thoughts and feelings toward architecture went against traditional views of architecture, especially those regarding high-rise buildings.

Kahn was important to the world of architecture for one main reason, Shapiro said.

"What Kahn was able to do was really question the basic questions and premises of the movement and functions of international style," Shapiro said.

He said at the time, the international style of architecture was more technologically oriented.

"International style was concerned more with the role of technology, and the idea of transforming the city to a new vision instead of working with pre-existing cities," Shapiro said.

Kahn's plans for a high-rise building were part of a movement that would rebuild and modernize downtown Kansas City, Rayner said.

"He was an innovative architect for the time," Rayner said. "He started inspiring a lot of people."

Kahn's high-rise project was to look like a building on top of a building, containing multiple cores and large hollow columns, which would house various offices.

"It doesn't look like your average office building," Rayner said.

Kahn's use of space challenged traditional uses and views, Shapiro said.

"He was concerned with the idea that architecture would communicate in a metaphorical way, through the organization of building, and use of space," he said.

"Buildings had become more and more dependent on mechanical services," Shapiro said. "Kahn felt they had to find their place in architecture, but not in human space."

Though there were many plans for the project, it was never finished.

The symposium is free and open to the public. Shapiro said those who come will walk away with a great understanding of Kahn's ideas, and how they might be relevant to buildings in a contemporary context.

Demonstrators burn U.N. office to protest sanctions

By AMIR SHAH
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KABUL, Afghanistan — Protesters angered by U.N. sanctions burned a U.N. office to the ground Monday, set effigies of President Clinton ablaze and scuffled with Taliban troops guarding the world body's buildings and equipment.

The United Nations accused the religious army of not doing enough to stop the violence, which has gone on daily since the U.N. decided to slap sanctions on the country over its refusal to turn over suspected terrorist Osama bin Laden.

Bin Laden, a Saudi exile who lives in Afghanistan, is accused of masterminding last year's twin U.S. embassy bombings in East Africa, killing 224 people.

"The Taliban provided guards and police to U.N. offices, but they proved powerless against such large crowds," said Erick de Mul, U.N. coordinator for Afghanistan, in a statement issued in neighboring Pakistan.

At demonstrations throughout Afghanistan, protesters have burned U.S. flags and effigies of Clinton, and stormed U.N. buildings.

In northwestern Farah province, a U.N. office was burned down, but no one was hurt. Other demonstrations have resulted in damaged buildings, vehicles and equipment, de Mul said.

On Monday in Jalalabad in eastern Afghanistan, a mob tried to storm U.N. offices, breaking windows and causing minor damage. A fight between the protesters and Taliban soldiers resulted in minor injuries, doctors in Jalalabad, said.

U.N. offices were closed and U.N. workers confined to their homes Monday.

The sanctions virtually cut whatever remaining links Afghanistan and its impoverished people had with the outside world.

They ordered the Taliban's overseas assets frozen and banned flights owned, leased or operated by the Taliban. Exemptions to the flight ban would be permitted for humanitarian reasons or to allow the Islamic pilgrimage to Mecca.

With the end of the international flights, all mail in or out of Afghanistan comes to a halt. The Taliban said the sanctions will affect people's ability to buy food and will hurt the poor the most.

President Clinton, on a state visit to Turkey, said Monday the sanctions will increase pressure on the Taliban to surrender bin Laden.

"The people of Afghanistan have already paid a high price in isolation because of the Taliban's continued harboring of this terrorist, and that toll will now increase," Clinton said in a written statement. "It is time for the Taliban to heed the will of the United Nations and end the threat of terrorism that emanates from within Afghanistan."

Wichita chief selected RCPD director

■ Watson chosen from among 6 finalists, will take pay cut.

By TRAVIS D. LENKNER
Kansas State Collegian

The chief of Kansas' largest law enforcement agency will take a $12,000 pay cut to work as Riley County Police Department director starting Jan. 3.

Wichita Police Chief Mike Watson will replace RCPD Director Alvan Johnson, Riley County Law Board Chairman Bruce Snead announced Tuesday.

Watson, 51, was chosen Saturday after the board interviewed six finalists for the job, including two RCPD captains.

Snead said Watson's experience, coupled with his knowledge of the Manhattan community, made him the best candidate.

"We looked for someone that could fit with the RCPD and our community, who had a knowledge of the community and who had experience with community-oriented policing," Snead said.

Watson's $80,000 salary is $5,000 more than the law board offered when it advertised for applications. Snead said Watson asked for the increase during his interview with the board.

"This was something he felt was important, and the law board felt that it was something they could agree to," Snead said.

The increase was important to lure Watson from his $92,000 salary in Wichita, Snead said, but he said the RCPD job isn't a step down for Watson.

WATSON

"I consider it a step up. The RCPD is one of the best police departments in the state and in the country. He wants to come here," Snead said. "I think it's a salute to the RCPD."

Watson has worked on the Wichita department since 1976, serving as chief since 1994.

He was eligible for retirement three years ago and will receive a pension package from Wichita in addition to his Manhattan salary.

He is known internationally for his work as Wichita chief, winning the prestigious Webber Seavey Quality Policing Award and several other honors during his tenure.

The RCPD — with its 88 officers and $7.8 million budget — is more than six times smaller than Wichita's department, but Watson said he was attracted to the job because of the Manhattan community, which he calls home.

He and his wife, Kate, both attended high school in Junction City and are K-State alumni. Their three daughters — Anastasia, Emily and Shannon — all are K-State students.

"Wichita has been great to me. I went from security guard to chief of police and raised my kids here," Watson said. "But this gives me an opportunity to go back to another

Theater ends discount rate for students

■ Seth Childs Cinema abolishes rate; Westloop changes to 2nd-run theater.

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

The Manhattan movie landscape is changing.

Carmike Cinema's Westloop 6 Theatres has gone from being a first-run theater featuring the latest films to a second-run theater where the price of admission is $1.50.

Philip Smitley, associate vice president for Carmike Cinema Inc., said the decision was made after the expansion to Seth Childs Cinema. In that expansion, the theater went from six screens to the now expanded 12.

Smitley also said the movie chain has discontinued its student discounts, which he said was a circuitwide decision. The chain now operates 450 theaters.

"That was taken away circuitwide in 36 states," Smitley said. "It was just a business decision."

Some K-State students said the lack of a discount hurts college students' pocketbooks.

McCain anticipates leisure
Kansas State Collegian
Democrats inherit pressure
Senate loosens belt

The Collegian's Nov. 8, 1974, edition reported as part of a four-part series that University President James McCain had made plans for his retirement.

To capture the essence of the man is difficult.

He will talk about world famine in one breath, and then in the next he will expound upon ancient Grecian history.

He can talk to anybody. His knowledge of conversation topics seems endless, and his wisdom appears to be infinite.

The man? Kansas State University president James McCain.

He's small, slightly built, but that doesn't characterize his abilities as president.

— Kansas State Collegian, Nov. 8, 1974

TOP: University President James McCain meets with Martin Luther King Jr. on Jan. 19, 1968. Throughout his presidency, McCain listened to concerns of minority students on campus, who said that racism existed at the university and was practiced by personnel.

Editor's Note:
■ This is the eighth in a series of stories celebrating the arrival of the year 2000. Each week, the Collegian will highlight a story from a decade of the century.

James McCain made a tremendous difference at K-State as the 10th university president and the longest serving, having a 25-year tenure.

During his presidency, McCain developed an extraordinary agricultural program and made strides in the veterinary medicine, engineering and the liberal arts programs.

MCCAIN

The state constructed buildings worth $110 million on campus. The university built a football stadium, McCain Auditorium and the Veterinary Medicine Complex and renovated the K-State Student Union.

McCain helped establish a committee for general scholarships and was one of the key figures in getting the Putnam Scholarship off the ground.

When he took office in 1950, fewer than 5,000 students attended the university. Enrollment had tripled by the time of his retirement.

It was his relationship with students that made him stand out.

Open door, open mind

Max Milbourn, McCain's only assistant throughout his term, said students did not have to make appointments to see the president. Milbourn often joked to McCain that in order to see him, Milbourn would have to enroll, because students were McCain's first priority.

Milbourn recalled several occasions when he needed to tell McCain something that was extremely important, but he would have to wait for a student to finish talking with the president.

Racial tensions

His quarter of a century in office dealt McCain many difficult issues, one involving his dealings with minority students.

According to the Oct. 16, 1970 Collegian, 60 black students met with the president to discuss racial problems.

The students discussed the residence halls, athletics, academics and general grievances with McCain.

The students said racism existed in the residence halls and was practiced by personnel. The racist behavior affected all black residents and their visitors.

It was noted that the coaching staff used racist policies to exploit black members involved in athletics. The students also urged the 13-year-old found guilty of murder, could receive life

By JIM IRWIN
The Associated Press

PONTIAC, Mich. — One of the nation's youngest murder defendants was found guilty Tuesday of second-degree murder for shooting a man to death in 1997, when he was 11 years old.

Jurors rejected a conviction on first-degree murder charges against Nathaniel Abraham, now 13. Such a conviction could have meant life in prison without parole. With the second-degree murder conviction, the boy faces a maximum of life in prison with the possibility of parole.

The jury deliberated over four days after listening to eight days of testimony. Nathaniel sat expressionless before and after the verdict was read.

Nathaniel was accused of shooting Ronnie Greene, 18, outside a convenience store in this northern Detroit suburb Oct. 29, 1997.

His case gained widespread attention as he became the first youth to be charged with first-degree murder and tried as an adult under a 1997 Michigan law that allows adult prosecutions of children of any age in certain serious felony cases.

While the boy was tried as an adult, Nathaniel's conviction on second-degree murder means the judge can sentence him as an adult or a juvenile. If sentenced as a juvenile, Nathaniel could be incarcerated until he turns 21 or the judge could choose a blended sentence, keeping Nathaniel incarcerated until 21 and then looking at the case again.

To convict Nathaniel of first-degree murder, the jurors would have had to decide that he plotted to kill Greene and that it was not a sudden impulse. To convict him of second-degree murder, the jurors only had to agree he either intended to kill or do great bodily harm or created a high risk of death or great bodily harm.

Oakland County assistant prosecutor Lisa Halushka had cited evidence that Nathaniel told a friend ahead of time that he was going to shoot somebody, practiced his aim on stationary targets, shot Greene in the head and bragged about it the next day.

"Nathaniel Abraham was able to engage in organized planning and goal-oriented activity," she said in her closing argument Wednesday. "We're left sitting with

Patrol planning campaign on child passenger safety

TOPEKA — The Kansas Highway Patrol plans to be more aggressive next week in ticketing motorists who let children ride in their vehicles without a seat belt or safety seat.

The patrol is one of 6,000 law-enforcement agencies participating in a national campaign to bring attention to child passenger-safety laws. The campaign, which begins Monday, is set for the week of Thanksgiving because of the extra holiday traffic on roads and highways.

"Troopers will be looking for and ticketing drivers with unrestrained children in their vehicles," Col. Don Brownlee, the patrol's superintendent, said.

The patrol said that in 1998, 42 children under the age of 16 died in highway traffic accidents. Of those, 29 were not wearing seat belts or sitting in safety seats.

Employees put on paid leave following death of shoplifter

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Four employees of a midtown drugstore were put on paid leave after a suspected shoplifter died while they restrained him as they waited for police.

Osco Drug officials said they had no evidence that excessive force was used, but that they were investigating whether store policy was followed and if that policy needed changing.

About 30 people protested outside the store Monday, calling on prosecutors to file charges, and urging a boycott of the store.

Demetrius Davis, 38, died last week shortly after he was released by the four employees who chased him from the store and held him face down on the sidewalk until police arrived.

"At this time we have no reason to believe that our employees did anything wrong," Karen Ramos, a spokeswoman for the store, said.

Bela Karolyi to take charge of U.S. women's gym squad

INDIANAPOLIS — Bela Karolyi, the bearish-looking coach who helped Nadia Comaneci, Mary Lou Retton and Kerri Strug win gold medals, is taking charge of the U.S. women's gymnastics program less than a year before the Olympics.

Karolyi, who retired after the 1996 Olympics, will be the women's national team coordinator, but he will not coach at the Sydney Olympics, USA Gymnastics said today. He will set the team's training programs and oversee its Olympic preparations.

"We need to make some adjustments to our women's program to improve our preparation for the 2000 Olympic Games," Bob Colarossi, president of USA Gymnastics, said. "Karolyi's efforts will make a significant difference in our ability to train at the highest level during the 10 months prior to Sydney."

Karolyi will advise the gymnasts' personal coaches and have a role in saying who makes the Olympic team.

"This is a special opportunity for me to continue supporting American gymnasts," Karolyi said. "This role suits me best since my retirement from training individual gymnasts. I take great pride in the results of the U.S. team and look forward to contributing to everyone's success."

The U.S. women's team won its first gold medal in 1996, with Strug becoming one of the enduring images of the Atlanta Games. Despite a badly sprained ankle, she completed a vault to seal the gold medal and then collapsed. Karolyi carried her in his arms to the podium to receive her gold medal.

Texas judge prohibits public from trial to ensure privacy

DALLAS — A Texas judge has barred reporters and other members of the public from portions of a trial between two telecommunications companies unless they promise not to discuss what they see and hear in the courtroom.

The judge's order Monday drew an immediate protest from news media lawyers, and The Dallas Morning News said it will appeal.

State District Judge David Evans indicated the order was designed to prevent disclosure of trade secrets and proprietary information.

DSC Communications Inc. sued Samsung Electronics Co. in 1996 after Samsung hired nine DSC engineers. DSC alleged that Samsung was trying to steal its digital-switching technology.

DSC was later purchased by Alcatel, a French company, which continued to press the case. Alcatel is seeking $425 million in compensatory damages, plus punitive damages.

Media lawyers said the judge's order limits the ability to cover the case.

"The theory of the law is: You don't stop speech; you punish if it's misused," said Terence M. Murphy, a lawyer for the News. "This is, in a sense, a gag order. If you sign the agreement, you are effectively gagged. If you don't sign the order, you can't go to court and these things are kept confidential and you are again gagged."

Charles L. Babcock, a Dallas lawyer, said he doesn't know of any similar restriction ever placed on reporters.

Judge upholds law that cuts funding for family planning

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. — A judge Tuesday upheld a law aimed at stopping state funding of family-planning agencies affiliated with abortion providers, ruling that Planned Parenthood must give back money it has received this year and can't get any more.

The Missouri Legislature acted legally when it imposed the budget restrictions, Cole County Circuit Judge Byron Kinder ruled.

He agreed with the state's arguments that both Planned Parenthood of the St. Louis Region and Planned Parenthood of Kansas and Western Missouri did not qualify for family planning money because they make referrals for or provide abortions.

And he said Planned Parenthood's abortion-provider services shared equipment, employee salaries, and facilities with its family planning units.

Missouri lawmakers have sought for several years to ban Planned Parenthood from allowing any state funding from being used to subsidize abortion services.

Planned Parenthood had countered that no state money was used for that purpose.

A spokeswoman for Planned Parenthood Federation of America Inc. headquarters in New York, Adina Wingate Quijada, refused to comment because its lawyers hadn't reviewed Kinder's decision.

However, statements by the organization made an appeal appear certain.

CLARIFICATIONS & corrections

There was an error in Tuesday's Collegian.

The Department of Architecture and the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art will sponsor a symposium concerning the work of Louis I. Kahn, who died in 1974.

university to teach the history of issues concerning race.

Besides listing the grievances, the students proposed a three-point program:

1) To initiate a program immediately for the purpose of increasing the black population at K-State to at least 10 percent. This included students, faculty and staff.

2) To institute remedial programs in English, math and science immediately.

3) To establish a complete black studies program on campus.

This wasn't the first time McCain dealt with racial problems that affected his students and staff.

In 1964, Delon Hampton, assistant professor of engineering at K-State, was refused service at a local barber shop, which aggravated McCain. He wrote a letter in the Feb. 17, 1964, Collegian that stated, "We recall with pride our designation as an all-American city, but racial discrimination is not all-American, but un-American behavior."

In an interview, McCain stated, "We must be mindful that international students, especially the many from Asia and Africa, judge us not only by the hospitality they receive, but equally by our treatment of our own minority group."

Some students still said McCain did not address the concerns of minorities to the extent he should have.

Milbourn recalled one incident that bothered McCain.

"In the Union, one black student skinned McCain alive, so to speak," he said.

It was a rough time period, Milbourn said.

"We were getting into the era of equal treatment. We weren't anywhere near where we are now," he said. "Those were days when it was not easy, and blacks were discriminated against in many ways, which they shouldn't have been."

Equality between sexes

In the Nov. 8, 1974, Collegian, Mary Allen, senior in pre-law and a founder of the campus chapter of Women's Coalition, spoke about the programs that were established concerning women's rights.

"If we would have tried to initiate some of our programs at other universities, there would have been no way," Allen said.

Allen said McCain was supportive of women's rights.

Milbourn said the president insisted on equal treatment of everyone.

"He tried to level the playing field," he said. "I remember how hard he worked at all of these areas. He wanted everyone to be involved, treated fairly and to not be discriminated against."

Touch for people

One of McCain's most admirable traits was the way he handled situations.

"I've always taken pride in his kind of leadership," Milbourn said.

McCain seemed to have a special way in dealing with people, which helped with issues such as the Putnam Scholarship.

"It was McCain's touch for people. ... These things couldn't have come about without McCain's attitude and his care for students. Students were always his No. 1 priority," Milbourn said.

While other universities and colleges were facing problems with riots, K-State had few. The reason for the peace can be explained in two words: McCain's insight.

Milbourn said there were reasons why there were few riots.

"We acted as one — not as students, not as administrators, not as faculty," he said.

McCain insisted on open lines of communication. Milbourn said McCain made it so "everybody knew what everybody else was doing. As a result, we didn't have a lot of problems other universities had.

"We really didn't have any riots. One of the reasons was because of McCain's insight."

Personal side

McCain was also noted for his sense of humor.

In the Nov. 8, 1974, Collegian, the president was asked many questions from students. One question was, "Do you mind if students cut through your yard when going to class?"

"I encourage it, especially pretty coeds," McCain answered.

Even though the president joked about the attractive female students, his heart belonged to his wife, Janet, and his daughter, Sheila.

The McCains met when Janet was a freshman and James was an English literature professor at Colorado State University.

Sometimes the stress and pressures of the job were brought home.

According to the Feb. 5, 1970, issue of The Kansas City Times, McCain told a Senate education committee he had been guarded for 10 days the previous February.

The guard was a result of law-enforcement officers uncovering a plot to assassinate him.

McCain and his wife were forced to leave their home due to threats on his life.

The reports involved one K-State student and three others who did not attend the university, but were involved with narcotics.

The loss of a legend

McCain was a legacy to all who knew him. He was named Kansan of the Year by The Topeka-Capitol Journal in 1973 and Special Distinguished Kansan by the Native Sons and Daughters of Kansas in 1977. In 1978, he was given the National Government Award for Distinguished Service.

When McCain retired in 1975, K-State lost a leader of high respect. Yet for 25 years the university had experienced a leader who truly cared about students.

He died in 1987 after being ill for several months. But he lives on in the students he helped turn into leaders, in the buildings he helped create and in the programs he helped establish.

1970-1979 Timeline
EVENTS AROUND THE WORLD

1970
- Cambodia's Prince Norodom Sihanouk is overthrown, and defense minister Lon Nol begins his reign of terror. Americans and South Vietnamese move into Cambodia.
- Music stars Jimi Hendrix and Janis Joplin die.

- The 26th Amendment lowers the voting age from 21 to 18.
- South Vietnamese forces begin an offensive in Cambodia but are repulsed six weeks later. The United States reduces its presence in Vietnam to 200,000 troops.
- The Pentagon Papers, a highly classified document dealing with U.S. involvement in Vietnam, is submitted to The New York Times and The Washington Post by a defense department official.

1972
- Sporadic violence in Northern Ireland culminates in "Bloody Sunday," when 13 Roman Catholics are shot by British troops during a riot. Two months later, Britain assumes direct control of Northern Ireland's government.
- Nike is founded and becomes world's largest sneaker company.

1973
- Direct American involvement in Vietnam ends with a declaration of ceasefire.
- The Supreme Court rules that women have the unrestricted right to abortion in the first trimester in the landmark case, Roe vs. Wade.

1974
- Nixon becomes the first president to resign from office to avoid an impeachment trial.
- India successfully detonates an atomic bomb, becoming the fifth nuclear power in the world.

1975
- The last American troops leave Vietnam as North Vietnamese troops complete an invasion of South Vietnam and unite both under Communist rule. In all, 1.3 million Vietnamese and 56,000 Americans died.
- Civil war erupts in Lebanon.

1976
- Ted Turner establishes WTBS in Atlanta, beginning his media empire.
- Stephen Wozniak and Steven Jobs found Apple Computers in a garage.
- In a reversal of a 1972 decision, the Supreme Court rules the death penalty constitutional.

1977
- Elvis Presley, Charlie Chaplin and Bing Crosby die.
- The world's last known case of smallpox appears in Somalia. The disease is considered eradicated when it does not appear after two years.

1978
- 20 million Volkswagen Beetles have been manufactured since 1949, but production of the vehicle halts until it re-appears in 1998.
- 98 percent of all Americans have televisions in their homes.

1979
- The Soviet Union invades Afghanistan.
- An oil-well blowout in the Gulf of Mexico becomes the largest spill ever as 3.5 million barrels of oil pollute the sea.
- A nuclear-related accident at Three Mile Island in Pennsylvania causes the evacuation of more than 100,000 residents.

1970-1979 Campus facts

■ After the retirement of James McCain, Duane Acker was made president of K-State. Among the problems he faced during the 1970s were high inflation and finding a location for the International Student Center. However, he also enjoyed increased enrollment and finding more students involved with making a change on campus and the community.

Entertainment

■ While much of the 1970s was spent recovering from the effect of the Vietnam War and discovering equality, K-State students enjoyed performances and speeches from top music groups and politicians of the time. Bill Cosby began the decade with his comedy, and music acts such as Blood, Sweat and Tears, The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band, Chicago, John Denver, The Pointer Sisters, Jefferson Starship and Joan Baez filled the campus with sound.

Sports

■ The new stadium received astroturf in the early 1970s, with many of the Big 8 Conference schools quickly following. The stadium also was enlarged to 43,000, then fifth in size in the conference. For the first time, the K-State football team was ranked in the top-20 preseason poll, but failed to meet expectations. Despite powerful players such as Lynn Dickey and Steve Grogan, expectations were demolished when the season resembled those the Cats had seen previously.

■ However, the K-State varsity rowing team finished in the top 10 in the nation, beating two of the national powers at the time — Columbia and Cornell universities. The women's basketball team also went collegiate in the early '70s. The men's basketball team enjoyed success with new coach Jack Hartman.

The energy crisis

■ K-State was not spared from the growing energy crisis affecting the entire nation due to the lack of fuel and oil. Thermostats were required to be turned to 65 degrees, and sales of gas cans and lockable gas caps set new records. Students cut down on trips to home and the university energy supply was cut, forcing campus lights to be turned off early.

Expansion

■ Ackert Hall was completed, allowing one building for biological sciences. Because of a grant from the National Institute of Health, a new Veterinary Medicine campus was constructed. The next phase of the K-State Student Union expansion was finished, allowing more activity space, a coffeehouse and a bookstore.

■ McCain Auditorium opened as a multipurpose, modern building, serving as a theater, concert hall and opera house after a fire destroyed Nichols Auditorium in 1968. An addition to Farrell Library opened to students, allowing them to get their own books and general reference material.

Academics

■ Diplomas were mailed to students when commencement exercises were optional for the first time, although 90 percent of undergraduates attended the ceremony.

■ The Kansas Board of Regents lifted the six-year ban on the sale of cigarettes on campus while the sale of alcohol was prohibited in the Union.

Stereotypes dominate blood drive's surveys

Men, have you ever had sex, even once, with a man since 1977? It's a pretty personal question, and it will be asked of you if you donate blood. If you say, "yes," you'll be deferred indefinitely from donating in the future. The Food and Drug Administration requires all blood banks to ask it, but maybe they should reconsider.

The logic for the question might hinge on numbers. Those who have engaged in sex with a male since 1977, in the eyes of the FDA, lead a higher risk lifestyle than those who answer "no" to the question.

However, by that logic, others should be barred from donation as well. For example, AIDS is the leading cause of death worldwide in black males. Should those who fit that category be prevented from giving blood?

The question also could hinge on the idea that HIV is transmitted more easily through anal sex than vaginal sex. However, gay males aren't the only people who engage in anal sex. If that is the logic behind the question, everyone should be asked if they have engaged in that sexual practice.

The question perpetuates a dangerous stereotype — that AIDS is a homosexual disease. And that is absolutely not true. Everyone is at risk, and everyone should be cautious.

The safety of our blood supply should be of the utmost importance. However, avoiding the perpetuation of stereotypes should be a priority as well. The FDA should keep both in mind.

Here's an idea for all you "Dogma" protesters: Go out and see the movie, and you'll see that your ideas aren't right.

After the Kansas City, Topeka and Manhattan papers ran a picture of the same two girls on the front page of their Sunday papers, I was glad to see the Collegian was original and ran those same girls in their Monday paper.

I just want to congratulate the Collegian's comedy page devoted to the people singing hymns about the "Dogma" movie.

Enough excuses. It was an old-fashioned butt-whoopin'. Let's move on and beat the crap out of those Tigers from MU.

I find it very tacky that the Collegian decided to use the picture they used on the front of Monday's paper about the Nebraska loss. I think you guys should have more class, and I was just wondering if your entire staff is Nebraska fans.

How can people protest "Dogma" when they haven't even seen it, and they don't know what it's about?

For you privileged students, please take "but" out of your vocabulary and accept everyone. The year 2000 is upon us.

I'm getting sick of the fact that the athletes get all the attention. I never got an article when I got my MIP two years ago.

You guys played like crap, but I still love you.

I love the flower girl, yeah.

"Dogma": a movie based upon a religion that is forced on its scholars. What's not funny about that?

Now that the most overrated team in college football finally lost to the Huskers, maybe the student body should flip their attention over and support its very underrated men's basketball team.

I know there was all this hype about Bishop being in town signing autographs and everything, but did anyone know that Jeff Kelly was in town this weekend?

I was wondering if this Michael Springer guy knows how to play quarterback.

Delay in paying debt to U.N. embarrasses U.S., destroys status as world's role model

There's something about being a college student that makes one sympathetic to those in debt. We all know what the checkbook is really for. And all of those student loans will be haunting us years from now.

But how about a $1 billion debt? Somehow the United States has racked up more than that in arrears to the United Nations.

If Congress had not agreed to pay at least $350 million of that by the end of the year, the United States would have lost its voting rights in the General Assembly. We would be joining such countries as Iraq, Somalia and Sierra Leone.

Even more disheartening is Republican sentiment about the whole situation.

"I honestly can't wait," Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., said in Monday's Time magazine. "If we lose our vote, that will call for a reassessment, and there will be a big national debate … about much of what goes on at the U.N."

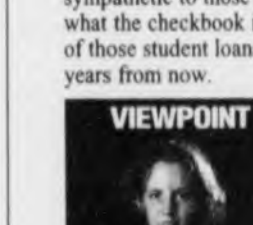
Smith is largely to thank for President Clinton's vetoing of two bills passed by Congress that would authorize payment of the debt. Smith has insisted that legislation would withhold money from organizations who lobby governments on — oh, what could this be — abortion, and Smith has the backing of House Republican leaders Tom DeLay and Dick Armey. Since tactics to retard abortion rights brings a smile to any right winger, one can correctly assume the opposite is true for left wingers.

Here comes the part I'm not too clear on. It seems as though if there is a bill one party or the other doesn't really want to see come to fruition, they will tack some sort of whacked-out rider to it. Clever, in its own way.

Whether we like it or not, the United States, as one of the biggest and most important U.N. members, is a leader and a role model to other countries. At least, it's supposed to be. But all Congress did by not quickly agreeing to a bill that authorizes payment of the debt is anger other countries.

It's embarrassing. The United States is acting like the big rich kid at school who bullies lunch money from other kids, and that's a nice analogy.

Time magazine reported the United States, by not paying its dues, is costing itself more money in the long run. Efforts to reduce America's portion of the U.N. peacekeeping bill from 30 percent to 25 percent are in trouble. Also, if the General Assembly vote is lost, the United States might be forced to give up its fight to keep the U.S. budget from expanding.



Yes, many, many a bad thing woul have befallen the United States come Jan. 1 if this isolationistic position wasn't changed. Although, key members of Congress are behaving as though neither the United Nations nor the world at large can survive without the United States, Congress did agree Monday to begin repaying debts. The fact remains that, because we are so valuable, we're allowed to scoff at the idea of paying our dues, no matter the cost to the rest of the world.

Smith, I wish we had lost our General Assembly vote. Not because of this reassessment of the United Nations, but because of how much stature we would have lost on the global scale.

Apathy in U.S. leads to wastefulness, refusal to recycle

Anyone notice the huge recycling bin in the free-speech zone in front of the K-State Student Union? Anyone notice aluminum cans in trash cans in classrooms and offices around campus, rather than in the recycling bin?

The bin is part of the second-annual K-State recycling competition. The competition pits K-State against rival schools in conjunction with America Recycles Day. It's a good idea, in theory; it raises awareness and encourages students to recycle.

However, the principle in itself is the dilemma — K-State students do not recycle regularly and need to compete with rivals Nebraska and Kansas in order to consider recycling worthwhile.

The problem is that while there have been recycling bins placed around campus this year, not everyone uses them. Believe it or not, some people actually don't take advantage of this easy opportunity to recycle because the bins are not as easily accessible as trash cans.

This is just one example of the apathy that plagues America.

People use paper plates because they don't want to wash dishes, regardless of the unnecessary trash they add to already overflowing landfills. Students leave newspapers in classrooms, or on the ground, or on the tables of the Union, rather than make the effort to place them in recycling bins. People don't really seem to care too much about recycling.

And why should they?

There is an endless supply of land to throw trash in, right? There are infinite resources in the world and the problem will take care of itself, right? No one really cares about maintaining at least part of the natural world as we know it, right?

Wrong. Many people seem to recognize the potential long-term damage that people are causing, but few really take action.

The list of things one can do is abundant; the list of things people actually make the effort to do is significantly smaller. The list of excuses for not doing anything is longer than both lists combined. Here are just a few:

I don't want to carry all that stuff outside to put it in the bins.

I fear bodily injury because I might cut myself on a can when I carry it to the recycling bins.

I don't know where to take the stuff to recycle it.

(And here's the real kicker.)

What difference does it make? I'm only one person.

The truth is, one American produces four pounds of solid waste per day — almost 1,500 pounds a year. Every day, Americans collectively produce about 200 million tons of trash, according to the Annenberg/CPB Projects. Of this, it is estimated that 70 percent can be reused or recycled.

Granted, this means sometimes people will have to wash dishes or water bottles rather than throw them away and buy new bottled water, but nonetheless, if it's feasible that Americans can reduce waste by 140 million tons — we're talking TONS, not pounds — then the real question is why not?

Does the list of excuses really justify filling the land with junk? The simple truth is no.

The simple truth is no one wants to take responsibility for an entire culture's over-consumption and sloppiness.

Even simpler, however, are the means to take a little bit of responsibility. It's really not hard to find a recycling bin on campus.

Nor is it hard to recycle at home. Consider the number of beer cans the average college household consumes and throws away in one week. Now consider how little beer money most people have. It's pretty simple math, really: Recycle cans, get money, buy beer; recycle cans, get money, buy beer. Of course, this requires one actually keep aluminum separate from regular trash and drive to a recycling center.

To some, this may be too demanding. For those who cannot handle this kind of responsibility, the very least one can do is put cans, newspapers and plastics in recycling bins on campus. Once this habit starts, it should be like brushing your teeth — you might not enjoy it, but the difference it makes is worth the effort it takes.

'Dogma' doesn't deserve hoopla; other movies more blasphamous

Editor,

I have a word or two to give to those local protesters who object to the showing of new film, "Dogma." Why is it this must be the movie fellow Catholics protest? There have been many other movies that blaspheme God. What about the movie, "Michael," which starred John Travolta as a fallen archangel who drank, smoked and took part in bar brawls? Or the recent movie, "The Messenger," where Joan of Arc, a devout Catholic, ridicules the hierarchy of the Catholic faith? I did not see protesters standing outside the theaters when these movies came out.

America is a country founded on freedom of speech, religion and expression, so the creator of "Dogma" technically had every right to make it. There always will be something that will offend another, but we can not tiptoe our way through life, avoiding the possibility of crushing others' feelings.

To the girl who said one of her criticisms was they portrayed God as a girl; how would you know what God is? I think we should respect other people's beliefs and feelings, but everything offends at least one other person in the world.

I think the best protest anyone can make is refusing to take part in it, and letting the business lose your money. I have been Catholic all my life, and I plan on seeing this movie to find out what all the hoopla is.

Reader praises 'Dogma' protest, hopes to assist in future efforts

Editor,

"Dogma" protesters, please do not worry about your so-called blasphemy-protest failure. When dealing with spiritual matter, you should see it with a spiritual view. When Jesus Christ died on the cross, normal people like you and me thought he had been a failure. But as we see, it turned out to be a glorious victory.

When people protested against this horrible blasphemy on Jesus, Mary and the Catholic Church on Sunday afternoon, they were spiritually inspired and guided by the the Holy Spirit.

The purpose of the protest was to show their love and faith to God and to their Church. Also, they wanted to bring an awareness to good people and a warning about the insulting movie's existence in Manhattan. Their goal has been fulfilled.

With all my heart, I admire, praise and encourage this valiant and enthusiastic group who showed up on Sunday near Seth Childs Cinemas. I regret I didn't know the event was happening — neither did many of us in the Manhattan Catholic community. I strongly believe the protesters might have triggered a chain of protests in the future in this little Manhattan similar to protests in the big Manhattan. Time will certainly tell.

Nebraska fan applauds K-State, fans for behavior during game

Editor,

This note is in regard to your article "Defending the Dream" on the Nebraska/K-State football game. I was at that game, and I must say how nice I thought K-State fans were. I told one of the fans, "I hope you don't do to us what you did to Iowa State."

"Don't worry, you are not Iowa State — you are better than that," he said.

I would like to say "keep up the good work" to the K-State football coaches, players and fans. Even though I am a diehard Nebraska fan, I know that Coach Bill Snyder is a great one and his day will come.

Just stay with him and believe in his system, and the time will come. Just remember how long it took Coach Tom Osborne to win his first national title — 21 years.

Have a great rest of the season and win your bowl game.

Students depart university for variety of reasons; K-State offers programs to help those struggling

STORY BY RHONDA NIDA

To keep from being a statistic, freshman at K-State must know where to get help.

Although statistics on dropout rates at K-State are at the lowest point in 10 years, Mike Lynch, vice president for educational and personal development, said 21 percent of full-time freshman leave the university their first year. He said the reasons students leave are different and apply to each individual case.

Reasons for leaving

"The most common reason, if you asked a student who leaves, is social acceptance," Lynch said. "Another reason people give is cost. They may not have financial aid, and because college was so expensive, they say they are going to lay out a while and work and go back someday. Generally, that is a very acceptable reason to give."

In reality, what most people find is that students who have the same financial aid and the same resources on which to draw, stay in school and graduate, he said. He said for some students, financial aid is critical.

Other reasons include not having the appropriate classes or skills in high school, and finding out they are not interested in the subject area they originally thought they were. A crisis developing at home or unplanned personal circumstances such as illness or pregnancy also are reasons students drop out. He said these reasons combined are substantial, but they still are not the biggest reasons students leave the university setting.

"I would say the major reasons are, for the lack of a better term, a general lack of focus," Lynch said, "or a student not being really sure why they are going to college and if they want to go to college. College is a lot of work, and if you're going to succeed, it is a lot of difficult work.

"Of that 21 percent, at least half of those students just don't come back," he said. "So, you don't have the opportunity to ask them why they are leaving. More students leave for academic reasons rather than nonacademic. Usually, what happens is that lack of focus translates into poor academic performance."

Lynch said that with the exception of the grades students see from time to time, the payoff from college is not visible immediately.

"This is work for a payoff that is four, five, six years down the road," he said. "The student has to be able to say, 'The reason I am doing this is because six years from now, I will be able to accomplish my goals.' That takes a lot of maturity."

For some, the answer to why students leave the university is made for them.

"I WENT FROM BEING PUSHED AROUND TO FINDING THE LIGHT TO BEING KICKED OUT."

—TYLOR BOGGS, FRESHMAN IN AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION

Tylor Boggs

Tylor Boggs, freshman in agricultural education, said he was asked to leave K-State after an unsuccessful first semester. Boggs started at K-State as a freshman in wildlife biology. He said he felt like he was thrown into his classes without any say in his curriculum, and he felt neglected by his teachers and adviser. He said he had no knowledge of procedures such as drop/add, and put forth minimal effort toward classes he didn't like. He said advisers were of little help, and he often didn't study or go to his classes. The result, he said, was poor grades for his first semester.

He switched to agricultural education three weeks from the end of the semester, but it was too late to correct his mistakes.

"I went from being pushed around to finding the light to being kicked out," he said. "When I first started school, I was full of hope and thought that college would be flexible with my needs and wants for an education. I was a freshman and thought this was the way everyone was thrown into K-State."

Boggs said the dean of his college did not ask any questions pertaining to his needs during his first academic meeting. He said he felt he was thrown into the hands of the department and was too inexperienced to know how to correct his problems.

The transition to a different major in another college made all the difference, Boggs said.

"The minute I switched my major, I was appointed an adviser and scheduled a time to see him the same day," Boggs said. "He said all the right things, and to top it off, he cared about my concerns and wanted me to succeed. Two days later, he called to back up his conversation with me and told me to feel free to come to him for anything. By the time all the help and support was there, it was too late because I had made a deep rut for myself."

Boggs' first semester was fall 1998. He said he received a letter during Winter break saying he was not allowed to return the following spring. He came back to K-State as a second-semester freshman this fall.

Making the decision to come back to K-State was simple for Boggs.

"I wasn't really concerned coming back," he said. "I knew what had to be done and what my worst-case scenario would result in. I felt more ashamed that I was a failure than anything."

Solving the problem

To decrease the dropout statistic, K-State offers several programs aimed at retaining students and ensuring success during their freshman year, Lynch said. He said K-State begins helping freshmen at summer orientation, combined with the efforts K-State makes to Kansas high school students.

"There's a lot of work that goes on to get students to campus," Lynch said. "We want them to be comfortable on campus so that when they arrive here in the fall of their freshman year, it feels a little more like home."

For being an open-admissions institution, Lynch said K-State does not do a bad job of retaining freshmen. He said institutions that are highly selective have much lower dropout rates, and there is a high correlation between the classes students took in high school, their national test scores and their success in college.

"There are not many open-admissions schools left, and we are not going to be very much longer," he said. "We've always been at the top of that tier, and with the new qualified admissions, our dropout rates will continue to go down. The more selective the schools, the lower the rate."

The freshman class of fall 2001 will be the first to meet qualified admission standards in order to attend any of the six state universities. Students must meet one of the three following criteria: an American College Testing composite score of 21 or higher; be ranked in the top one-third of their graduating class or have a grade point average of at least a 2.0 on a 4.0 scale.

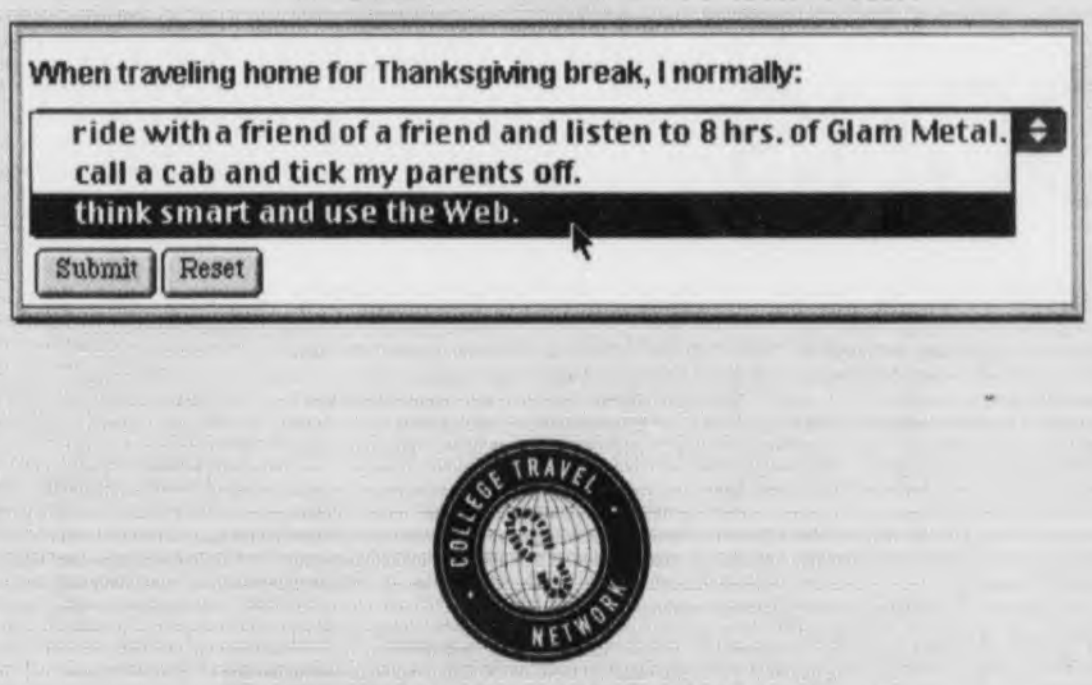
A Unique Experience

The University Experience program helps new freshmen adjust to K-State in a variety of ways, said Judy Lynch, director of University Experience. Bringing in speakers from campus services such as counseling, career and employment and academics helps new students find out where they can go for help, to look for a job, and with questions right from the start, Judy Lynch said.

"We also do the traditional speakers on AIDS, STDs, alcohol, drugs and even the Riley County attorney, who will explain to them the consequences of breaking the law in Manhattan," she said. "These are topics they have probably heard in the past but need to hear again as freshman. So by connecting them with services and reminding them of things that can impede their success, we are helping freshman adjust to college life."

Tylor Boggs, freshman in agricultural education, said he was asked to leave K-State after an unsuccessful first semester. JEFF COOPER/ COLLEGIAN

With more than 700 freshmen enrolled in the fall 1999 semester of University Experience, Judy Lynch said the class helps freshmen focus on their goals and why they're at college.



"The longer I'm here, the more I realize students that have problems are most often the ones who don't have clearly defined reasons for being here," she said. "They don't see a connection with what they're doing in their classes and how that affects them in the long range, so we try to do a lot of career exploration. Once a student has made the first connection and finds out what they want to do when they grow up, then they can focus on how to get there."

Enhanced University Experience offers an academic component and employs undergraduate students to teach recitations and attend general education classes such as algebra, psychology and geography.

"Not only does their teacher go to class with them, instructors also have the opportunity to be positive role models by talking about their own classes," Judy Lynch said. "The instructors are good role models for freshman to see every day. It also gives freshman a nice group of people they might see in their classes, so they connect with other students quicker than otherwise."

As a recitation leader for EUE, Greg Cleaver, senior in political science, said he serves as a central contact for the students in order to solve any problems or address concerns they might have. He said instructors lead the recitation

Cat fan optimistic after 100 straight road games

Dedication.

Robert J. Lipson is the embodiment of the word, as he attended his 100th consecutive conference road game this weekend at Memorial Stadium in Lincoln, Neb.

As the Wildcats took the field Saturday, the 49-year old was on the sidelines, clad in his commemorative T-shirt and white K-State painter's hat, waving his "#1" foam hand proudly in the air.

It was a moment for the ages. What a more fitting way to have No. 100 than what was perhaps the biggest game in K-State football history, part two?

"Nebraska's Memorial Stadium is the most colossal place to play football in the entire conference," Lipson said. "It was the most important game of the year, for the Big 12 Conference "snoff." It was on national TV. I guess that could be as appropriate as you can get for my 100th consecutive conference road game."

But the game's turnout was much like past K-State football seasons Lipson witnessed in the 1970s and '80s: a loss.

Of the 100 conference road games he's attended, K-State has finished with a record of 26-73-1, with only five victories coming prior to head coach Bill Snyder's arrival at K-State in 1989.

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/COLLEGIAN

Robert J. Lipson has been attending K-State conference road football games since 1973 and has yet to miss a single game. The Nebraska game Saturday marked his 100th consecutive game.

However, Lipson said his 100th consecutive conference road game was not the greatest moment of his life.

"My greatest moment in my life would be winning the Sugar Bowl this year, or winning the Orange Bowl next year or winning the Rose Bowl in 2002. That would be the greatest," he said.

Lipson remembers his first conference road game distinctly. It was Oct. 13, 1973. K-State traveled to the University of Kansas' Memorial Stadium to face the Jayhawks.

"It was one of the most disappointing losses," Lipson said. "We were behind 17-3 and we came back, fought, battled in the second half and took the lead on a couple of Keith Brumley field goals. We had a safety, a touchdown, two field goals and took the lead 18-17."

But a Wildcat fumble with minutes left gave the Jayhawks one last opportunity.

"Kansas took it down the field, went for two and got it. And that was an extremely hard one to take," he said.

Since then, Lipson has attended every conference road game, including when K-State met Nebraska in Big 8 regular season action at the 1992 Coca-Cola Bowl in Tokyo.

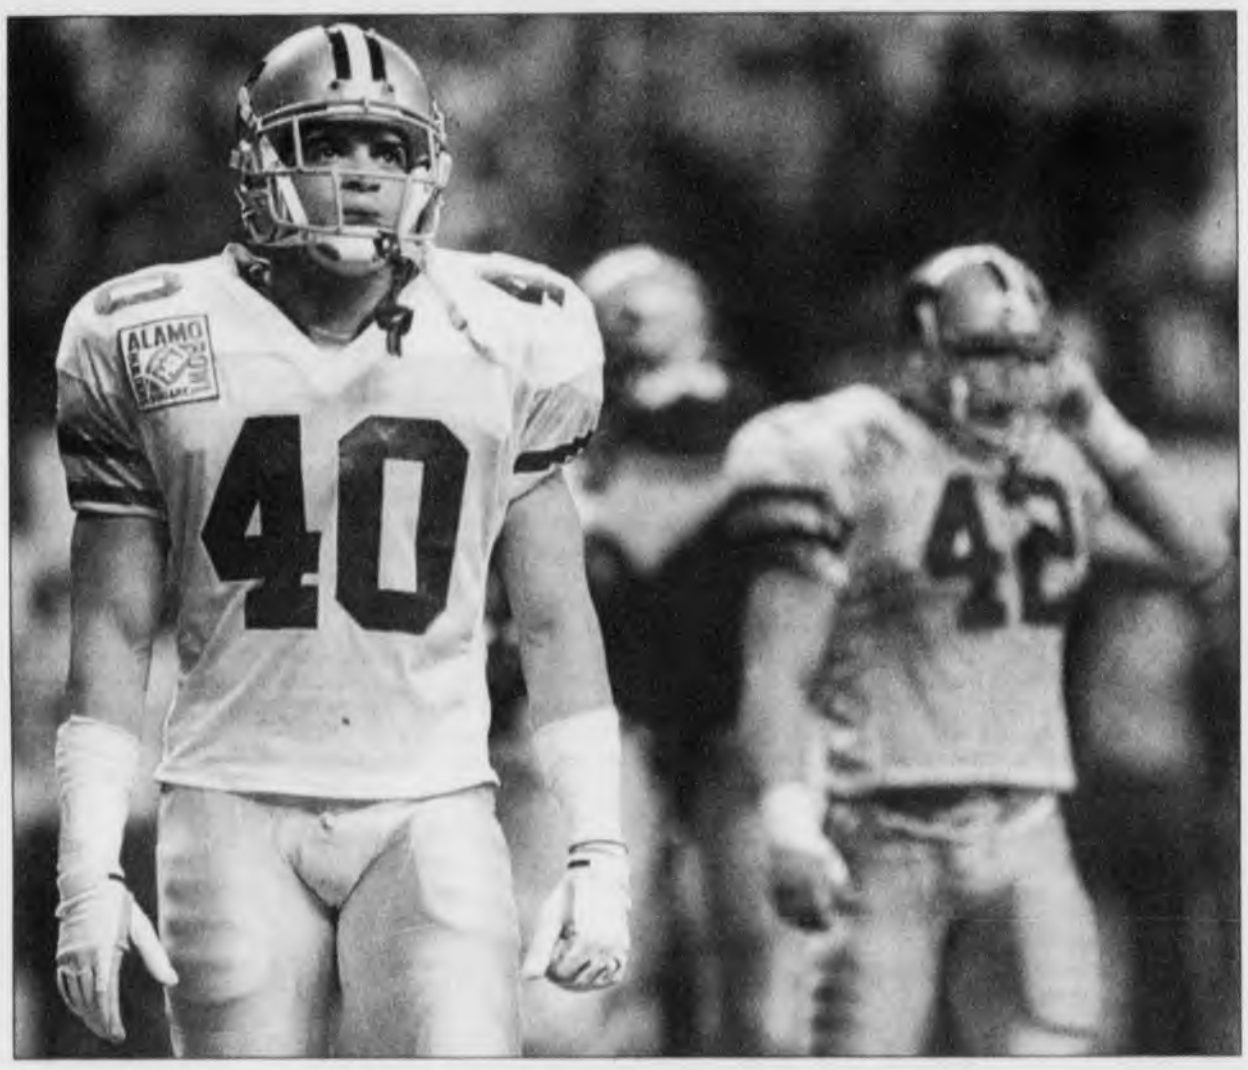
"He's been here forever," junior running back David Allen said. "He's a great guy. He loves the Wildcats, or else he wouldn't come to all these games. He supports us like none other. He's been at every game I've ever been to."

Lipson said he is proud to have been a part of what has been called the greatest turnaround in college football history.

"First of all, I've been following Kansas State for 27 years, but I've not always been watching the Wildcats play," Lipson said. "For many years I've been watching the MILDcats play, so it is a real pleasure to watch the Wildcats play again."

Lipson has had many distinct memories over the years, including his 50th consecutive conference road game, Oct. 10, 1987, in Columbia, Mo.

"It was memorable because Stan Parrish gave me a sideline bench pass, and it was a unique experience for me that I'll never forget," he said.



Parrish, the head coach at the time, even insisted that Lipson lead the team out on the field before the game.

Lipson's favorite Wildcats over the years are place kicker Steve Willis (1981-84), punter Scott Fulhage ('81-'84) and center Andy Harding ('81-'85), because of his personal relationship with the three players.

"Andy, Steve and Scott have been very special to me over these many years," he said.

Lipson grew up in Sullivan County, N.Y. After graduating from Liberty High School in 1969, he attended community college in Farmingdale, N.Y. After five semesters there, Lipson decided to transfer colleges and pursue a biology major. He chose the Wildcats and attended K-State from 1972 through fall 1974.

Lipson said he almost picked Ohio State over K-State. "To this day, I've wondered what my life would have been like hating Wolverines instead of Jayhawks," he said. "I wished we would have played Ohio State last year in the Fiesta Bowl. I would have loved that opportunity."

Wildcats attempt to retain perspective after loss in season's most anticipated game

BY RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State football team must be getting to hate this time of year.

Last season, the Wildcats' hopes for a berth in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl – last year's national title game – evaporated into the frigid December air following a 36-33 overtime loss to Texas A&M in the Big 12 Championship game.

This season, the Wildcats' hopes for a berth in the Nokia Sugar Bowl – this year's national title game – were trampled into the freshly-installed turf of Tom Osborne Field during a 41-15 defeat last weekend at the hands of the the Nebraska Cornhuskers.

Though some of the details have changed, the storyline is eerily familiar for head coach Bill Snyder's club. The only thing yet to be determined in this sequel is the ending. Last season, demoralized by their slide from the doorstep of the national championship game into the Builder's Square Alamo Bowl, the Wildcats sleepwalked into San Antonio and were beaten 37-34 by an unranked Purdue team.

Once again, as they finish sifting through the shards of their national title hopes, the Wildcats must prepare for a final test, this time against the Missouri Tigers in Saturday's regular-season finale.

Snyder said that, unlike last season, when the Cats had to wait weeks before playing Purdue, the quick turnaround for this weekend's game would help K-State to muster the necessary intensity.

"It's mandatory. ...You have to turn around and play right now" he said. "You don't have an opportunity to sit and feel sorry for yourself."

On the surface, the importance of a focused performance this weekend seems self-evident. The Wildcats' thin hopes of a berth in the Big 12 Championship Game rest with their performance in this cap to the 1999 regular season, as do many of their bowl prospects.

If there ever were a chance for K-State to be lulled into a trap, however, the Tigers could play well the part of a Trojan Horse. Missouri, which finished last season 8-4 and ranked 21st in the AP Top 25 poll, limps into Wagner Field this season with a 4-6 record, having lost five of its last six games.

Last year's Missouri squad, however, nearly knocked off the Wildcats in a tense 31-25 season finale in Columbia. With that in mind, K-State wide receiver Aaron Lockett said the Wildcats would not take Missouri lightly, regardless of its record.

"They're not as bad as their record indicates," Lockett said. "Last year, it was frustrating for them to lose to us at home, and I think that they definitely want revenge."

Indeed, judging by their comments at Tuesday's press conference, the Wildcats seem to have picked up on the moral of last year's story. According to strong safety Jarrod Cooper, the team is intent on writing a happier ending to this year's season.

"If we learned anything from last year, it's not to let one game kill us twice," Cooper said.

Linebacker Ben Leber and safety Lamar Chapman echoed Cooper's sentiments, saying any self-pity following Saturday's loss has been set aside as the Wildcats turn their energies to Missouri.

"We're very focused," Leber said. "That game (Nebraska) is behind us – we're getting ready for Missouri."

"I know Missouri is going to come down here and play hard," Chapman said. "I think after the loss last week, the team is pretty much over that. We're looking forward to Saturday and to playing."

Final day of football action could have surprises in store

CHRISTOPHER MCLEMORE

Without a doubt, the Wildcats play in the toughest conference in the nation. The proof is in the numbers. The Big 12 has three of the top-nine teams in the country — K-State, Texas and Nebraska. Those three teams have four combined losses. Of those losses, three were against each other. K-State lost to Nebraska, Nebraska lost to Texas and Texas lost to K-State. The other loss was Texas's early-season let-down to a feisty NC State.

Sure, the Big 10 is tough, but when teams like Penn St. lose back-to-back games at home know something is wrong. The Big 10 champion, Wisconsin, has been sketchy since day one. My vote goes to the Big 12.

Speaking of voting, there is no doubt Wisconsin's Ron Dayne will get the Heisman trophy. He's had his ups and downs, but he broke Ricky Williams's career-rushing record, and he doesn't shop at Dillards.

Dayne will woo the Heisman voters, and then Wisconsin will go on to win its second AT&T Rose Bowl in two years.

K-State's hopes for a BCS bowl bid are real. If Nebraska wins out (against Colorado and Texas), the Cornhuskers would have a shot at the Nokia Sugar Bowl. That would give the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl the second selection out of the Big 12. Assuming the Wildcats beat Missouri, K-State would get picked over Texas, who would have three losses.

If Nebraska doesn't go to the national title game in New Orleans, K-State might play in the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl. The officials for the Cotton Bowl already have made it known they don't want to select Texas because the locals don't generate enough revenue. They saw how well the Wildcat fans traveled to Dallas in 1997 and wouldn't pass up the purple pack.

K-State still has an outside shot at the CompUSA Florida Citrus Bowl if Nebraska goes to the Fiesta bowl, but that could be a long shot.

Of course, all of the above possibilities vanish if K-State loses to Missouri, or if Nebraska loses to Texas in the Big 12 Championship game, or both.

I'd comment on just how pathetic the Missouri Tigers are, but I don't want to get any nasty e-mails complaining that I don't respect K-State's opponents. Then again, the Tigers have done nothing to merit respect. I've got a hunch that the Mizzou basketball team would fare better against the Wildcats. Then again, I wouldn't want to make anyone angry.

K-State 45, Missouri 3. That's not disrespect. That's brutal honesty.

Speaking of e-mail, my address has changed. Send all complaints to pres@ksu.edu. Expect prompt replies to all e-mails that contain five or more misspelled cuss words.

Just in case you're wondering, here's my season ending scenario: Florida will beat FSU, but will lose in the SEC championship game. The Virginia Tech Hokies will beat Boston College on a fourth-quarter field goal, but will lose to a fired-up Temple team still seething from an early-season loss to Maryland. K-State scores 95 points against Missouri, who actually comes away from KSU Stadium with 6 total yards — all off penalties. Nebraska beats Colorado 2-0 on a last-minute safety, but then loses to Texas in the fifth overtime period on a blown call by a paid-off referee. Alabama has 23 players suspended for taking illegal donations and Tennessee refuses to accept any bowl bid except for a bid to the Micron PC Bowl. Wisconsin already has accepted a bid from the Rose Bowl, so K-State plays in the Sugar Bowl against Florida State. Peter Warrick gets ejected for wearing a stolen Tommy Hilfiger sweatervest over his jersey, and Coach Bobby Bowden gets kicked out of the game when he does his Woody Hayes imitation and punches his punter in the nose for actually punting to David Allen. The Wildcats win the game when Joe Hall, the largest running back in college football, fakes a run and throws a touchdown pass to Aaron Lockett, the smallest wide receiver in college football.

Call your friends, cause I've got a funny feeling about this.

Volleyball team to face Aggies tonight

BY IVAN KOZAR
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 18 K-State volleyball team will face one of its toughest challenges of the season as it travels to College Station, Texas, tonight to face the No. 14 Texas A&M Aggies.

The Aggies (21-5, 12-4) are on an 11-game home winning streak this season and have won 15 consecutive matches at the G. Rollie White Coliseum, dating back to last year.

The Wildcats (18-6, 12-4), who have never won in College Station, are coming off their third consecutive three-game sweep as they prepare for A&M.

"We've mixed a little bit of down time with some good training, and I think it's keeping our legs fresh, our minds fresh and we're staying in a good rhythm," head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

With both Texas A&M and the Wildcats tied in the Big 12 Conference standings, the Wildcats could capture sole possession of second place with a win.

"If we pass and get better throughout the match, then we can get that second place spot," McLaughlin said.

Despite having the overall series between the two schools tied at 4-4, with both teams never winning on the road, the Wildcats remain focused and confident for the match.

"Emotionally and mentally, we're in a good spot, and the team looks good. You watch them as they come into practice and when they leave, and they look fresh. Now, the key is that we have to stay healthy — that will be important to us down the stretch," McLaughlin said.

McLaughlin will be striving for his 200th career win as head coach tonight, with 142 wins coming while coaching for the men's volleyball team at Southern Cal. McLaughlin is 57-31 in his third year at K-State, and has a 35-21 record in Conference play.

The Aggies are led by senior middle blocker Amber Woolsey, who averages 4.20 kills per game and has 780 total attacks on the year.

Despite facing a powerful offense, the Cats remain confident.

"I think the rhythm we're in, if we pass well and serve tough, we can win the match," McLaughlin said.

Julie Thomas dives for a ball in Saturday's game against Missouri. K-State won in three straight games to improve its record to 18-6, 12-4.

Comfort Inn to be finished along Highway 24 by May

Construction of a 65-room Comfort Inn should be completed by May 1.

The construction of the hotel has already started near U.S. Highway 24 and Manhattan Town Center. So far everything is going smoothly, said Sheri Wilcox, office manager for GoForth Rogers Construction.

C.G. Investments of Manhattan decided to build the hotel because of the university and Fort Riley.

"We thought the town was growing. We have a similar property in Lawrence, and we have good experiences with college towns. They are busy even in the winter," Pankaj Patel, vice president of C.G. Investments, said. "We liked that location because it's located near a shopping area and good eating places."

The hotel will cost nearly $3 million to build, Patel said.

Other hotels near the K-State campus probably will not be affected by the Comfort Inn, said John Rychlock, Ramada Plaza Hotel general manager.

"It will probably have an effect right at first when people try it out, but other than that it really won't affect things," he said.

Explicit e-mails spur search for writer by K-State police

The sexually explicit e-mails sent to more than 60 female students by a subject calling himself "Matt" are still under investigation by the K-State Police, and e-mails still are being reported.

Sgt. Troy Lane said he is working with the district attorney to subpoena two different agencies in an attempt to identify the suspect.

"Most of the Internet and e-mail providers, in order to release information on a user, need court orders or a subpoena," Lane said.

Lane said the suspect might not necessarily be a K-State student. Due to the wide availability of student information, including e-mail addresses, anybody could simply have looked in the K-State white pages and picked random names.

Lane did say that no connections had been found among the victims.

"I have not found any correlation to lead me to believe the suspect knew them personally," Lane said. "They didn't all have a class together."

Lane said he will continue to work on the case.

"This case is a pet project of mine," Lane said. "I'm trying to take care of it as good as I can."

Datebook accidently lists class in session on Nov. 24

Students will not have class Nov. 24.

The Union Program Council programmer, a student datebook sold at the K-State Union Bookstore, failed to list the Wednesday before Thanksgiving as a student holiday.

Heide McBride, UPC program adviser, said the mistake was just an oversight on behalf of the committee. UPC consults the official university calendar, which lists the day as a student holiday.

"For many years, the classes meet during Thanksgiving week on Monday and Tuesday," said Don Foster, university registrar, who is in charge of organizing the school calendar. "Wednesday is a student holiday. However, Wednesday is not a university holiday, so offices will be open."

Residence halls will close at 10 a.m. next Wednesday morning and reopen at 1 p.m. Nov. 28.

Derek Jackson, assistant director of housing and dining, said each residence hall will have a checklist for residents to complete before they will be allowed leave.

The list will include things such as closing windows, turning off heaters and unplugging all appliances.

Politicians express desire to break IRA deadlock in Belfast

BY SHAWN POGATCHNIK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — Northern Ireland's political rivals signaled Tuesday they were determined to break the past year of stalemate, making conciliatory statements and building expectations of an important Irish Republican Army announcement.

In a pivotal concession, Ulster Unionist leader David Trimble dropped his Protestant party's refusal to form a Protestant-Catholic administration for Northern Ireland — the intended cornerstone of the Good Friday peace accord of 1998 — in advance of receiving an IRA promise to disarm.

The IRA-linked Sinn Fein party, which is to receive two posts within the proposed 12-member Cabinet, in exchange called disarmament an essential part of the peace process.

Survey by Red Cross evokes questions

BY SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A question posed to potential blood donors is causing uncertainty among some activists.

Potential donors are asked if they are a man who has had sex with another man since 1977. If they answer yes, their blood is refused.

The Red Cross asks this question to determine if donors lead high-risk lifestyles, said Lora Schneider, area donor recruitment representative for Red Cross.

"We're a nonprofit organization," she said. "This is a safety net. It's a precaution."

Shane Holt, treasurer of Queer/Straight Alliance, said it should not be assumed that gay men have unprotected sex more than heterosexuals. Anyone without transmittable diseases should be allowed to donate blood, he said.

"Anybody willing to help save a life should have that opportunity," he said.

Schneider said the U.S. Food and Drug Administration requires the Red Cross and other blood banks to ask this question.

"The FDA requires us to quiz people pretty heavily on lifestyle," she said. "We're required to ask several other questions as well."

These questions include whether potential donors have ever paid for sex, used intravenous drugs, gotten tattoos in the last 12 months or tested positive for syphilis or gonorrhea, she said.

Although the blood supply goes through another check to make sure it is not contaminated with any viruses, it saves time and costs of storage and transportation if the blood can be determined as unusable at an early stage, Schneider said.

"This is the FDA's way of regulating the blood supply and guaranteeing the safest blood possible," she said. "It's not about discrimination of lifestyle."

Others feel it is discriminatory to refuse blood based merely on a lifestyle choice without a true medical cause.

Karrie Mitchell, president of QSA, said this is discrimination in its purest form.

"This is blatant discrimination," she said. "More appropriately, it should ask if you have had sex with unprotected partners."

Lowell Tilzer, physician for Red Cross, said protecting the blood supply is the driving force behind these questions.

"All the blood is checked," he said. "The tests we check with are not perfect. They're very good, but not perfect. We cannot detect some diseases in early stages of the infections."

Tilzer said this form of discrimination is necessary in maintaining healthy blood.

"We discriminate against anyone at high risk of transmitting disease," he said.

The question should be broadened to include sexual practices and should not focus on gay men only, she said.

The current system should change to be more donor-friendly, Holt said.

"In a sense, I think it invades privacy," he said. "It's hurtful to have to walk out without donating.

"They should try some different approaches," he said. "They could have a different line of questioning for homosexuals that would ask more about safe-sex practices."

Holt said he hopes changes will be made so willing people, like him, can donate blood.

"I have the blood type that everyone can use and not very many people can give," he said. "I could be saving a life."

The HIV/AIDS epidemic in the U.S.

- The highest HIV-infection prevalence rates among populations at risk for HIV nationwide were found among men who have sex with men attending STD clinics. The median prevalence rate in these clinics was 19.3 percent.
- Injected-drug users diagnosed with AIDS represented 24 percent of AIDS cases in men and 47 percent of those in women in 1997.
- Blacks and Hispanics accounted for 47 percent and 20 percent, respectively, of persons diagnosed with AIDS in 1997, the highest proportions thus far in the epidemic.
- Youths aged 13 through 24 years accounted for 4 percent of AIDS cases reported during the one-year period from July 1997 through June 1998. They accounted for 15 percent of HIV infection (not AIDS) cases reported during the same period.

Comfort Inn to be finished along Highway 24 by May

Construction of a 65-room Comfort Inn should be completed by May 1.

The construction of the hotel has already started near U.S. Highway 24 and Manhattan Town Center. So far everything is going smoothly, said Sheri Wilcox, office manager for GoForth Rogers Construction.

C.G. Investments of Manhattan decided to build the hotel because of the university and Fort Riley.

"We thought the town was growing. We have a similar property in Lawrence, and we have good experiences with college towns. They are busy even in the winter," Pankaj Patel, vice president of C.G. Investments, said. "We liked that location because it's located near a shopping area and good eating places."

The hotel will cost nearly $3 million to build, Patel said.

Other hotels near the K-State campus probably will not be affected by the Comfort Inn, said John Rychlock, Ramada Plaza Hotel general manager.

"It will probably have an effect right at first when people try it out, but other than that it really won't affect things," he said.

Board of Regents to meet today to discuss future budgets, funds

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

The Kansas Board of Regents meets today to discuss future budgets and funding.

"The budget issue is a crucial one right now," Steve Clark, regents member, said. "There is ongoing discussion about it."

The governor's office is recommending a 1-percent recession of the state budget.

Board member Floris Jean Hampton said this puts the state's universities in a difficult position.

"It's hard to think we can do more and be asked to do more with less than what we have had," Hampton said.

Discussion also will include matters related to fiscal affairs, where board members will have the opportunity to discuss their concerns about future budget requests.

At this time, they will have the opportunity to discuss the status of appeals being made to the governor concerning the budget.

Regents Chairman William Docking said a meeting has been called to discuss an appeal.

"An important topic is the budget appeal scheduled for next month," Docking said.

Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance at K-State, said the cuts would affect about $1.6 million of the university's budget when factoring in outreach programs.

Another topic to be discussed at the meetings will be the proposed merger between Fort Hays State University and Pratt Community College.

Members of both colleges met with the board last month, but no decision was reached.

Clark said a merger between the two schools would have a tremendous effect on future mergers.

"If this merger is done, then it will establish a new precedent and the possibility for other mergers," Clark said.

The board has another issue to deal with regarding salaries and pay equity in its office.

The concern arose when Christine Crenshaw, a board staff member, filed a complaint alleging she has been paid as much as $20,000 less because of her gender.

Her claim now is in litigation, and the board also plans a separate executive session regarding future mediation of the case.

"The press reported we are in the process of mediation, and the process is preparing to go through a mediator," Docking said. "I cannot comment much more than that."

Kirk Lowry, Crenshaw's attorney, said the mediation will take place Nov. 23, and said his client is looking forward to the mediation.

"We have both agreed to sit down and talk," Lowry said. "We are at least going to try and work it out."

Commission approves addition to city's west side

By TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

City commissioners unanimously passed an ordinance Tuesday that allows a restaurant and office park to build on Manhattan's west side.

The city's Comprehensive Land Use Plan was amended in the ordinance, which rezones 14.3 acres of land east of the future intersection of Kimball Avenue and Grand Mere Parkway. The zoning changes will allow for construction of the JenTre Planned Unit Development.

Eric Cattell, Manhattan assistant director for planning, said community opposition to the project originated primarily from the proposed restaurant. The city clerk's office also has received a protest petition regarding the project.

Manhattan resident Keith Ratzloff, who lives adjacent to the proposed site, said the project will work against the city's philosophy to revitalize downtown Manhattan. He said noise from the restaurant's patio area will affect area residents adversely.

"I'm really concerned that the patio will turn into a partying place, which will raise the noise level considerably in our neighborhood," Ratzloff said.

JenTre representative John Conderman said the addition will be beneficial to west Manhattan. He said property owners were receptive to the needs of area residents.

"The location of the restaurant was changed on two separate occasions in response to concerns by the neighbors," Conderman said.

A banquet facility and floral shop are also part of the proposal. The restaurant, which will have a 300-person seating capacity, will be set in the center of the development.

Commissioner Carol Peak said the development will be an asset to the community, as more small commercial districts could benefit Manhattan.

"I really think this is a quality proposal and this is one of the best developments you could have in that specific spot," she said.

Conderman said the property owners are in contact with potential tenants for the office space.

"In the overall good of this city, this is a good project," he said. "There are other cities that would die to have this."

Commissioners also discussed creating a Housing Authority Board of Commissioners, which would abolish the Public Housing Authority Advisory Board. Protesters who disagreed with the change picketed City Hall before the meeting.

Manhattan resident Revel Herndon said the five-member board should at least include two elected tenants of housing and one city commissioner. The current proposal could include the same members who now serve on the advisory board.

"If this goes through, the biggest fear is what will happen to low-income families," she said. "Every one of them is a non-listener."

Manhattan resident Sara Lawson said board members who live in public housing would listen to resident complaints.

"A true resident would know our concerns and take them more seriously," she said.

Privilege Fee Committee approves budget increase of $3,193 for KSDB

By JENNIFER RYAN
Kansas State Collegian

The Privilege Fee Committee voted to increase the KSDB-FM 91.9 budget to $45,869 Tuesday.

If passed by Student Senate on Thursday, the increase would not affect student privilege fees, Ryan Walker, committee chair, said.

The total budget for the station would be increased $3,193, with $2,500 earmarked for equipment expenses and $693 for the station manager's salary.

The increase follows last year's budget increases and station audit, which revealed large discrepancies in the way funds were used at the station. The audit showed the station needed changes in overall management of operations, depositing all university receipts into a university account, time and leave reporting and personal phone-call policies.

"Most of the increases last year went to the station manager's salary," said Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications. "I can feel the difference every time I'm over there."

This year the station has completed its first actual budget and hopes to create a consistent budget for equipment and other station expenses, Simon said.

Committee member Ted Conrad, host of "A Purple Affair," said the modest increase was the safest route to go due to the lack of a budget history for the station.

"Let's increase a little bit, but still be cautious and come back to after some history has been laid out," Conrad said. "I think that the last year's increases and this year's review were designed to look at how the station spent the increase and if they spent it wisely. Just being on the air at the station, I know some of the stuff is really old and needs to be replaced."

The station's finances also could be

NAVIGATING YOUR FAITH

Christian group on campus meets each week to examine Bible, discuss meaning

STORY BY JENN DAVOREN

Many opportunities exist on campus to allow K-State students a chance to extend faith study beyond Sunday church services and to look at the Bible with others interested in understanding the aspects of their religion.

Each Monday in Union 206, members of the K-State chapter of the Navigators meet to discuss different passages of the Bible and how they apply to everyday life. While the Navigators group meets as a whole each Thursday evening at the Aggieville Pizza Hut, the members of the organization break into smaller sections in order to aid in Bible study, said Mark Spears, senior in golf course management.

The Monday evening group is working on "The Heart of Christ," a Bible study-aid put together by Navigator leaders in its Lawrence chapter.

"Each week, it takes a different aspect," Spears said. "It's a topical study of the four gospels."

Although "The Heart of Christ" maps out themes for conversation, Josh Hebert, senior in milling science, said the study group didn't necessarily adhere to each week's chosen topic. Instead, the members might look at other aspects of the meeting's discussion and talk at length, if they wish.

"It's definitely a laid-back atmosphere," Hebert said.

Spears said he and Hebert serve as group facilitators in order to assist in the flow of discussion but do not serve as group leaders in any way. In this way, talk is not led down a particular path and instead can take any direction the Bible study group would like, Spears said.

"As facilitators, we look at the passages more in depth, so that if any questions come up, we can help," he said. "We look at more verses to shed light on things."

The Navigators' study groups are winding down with the approaching end of the semester — next week marks the final meeting of the Monday study group — but Spears said any student is welcome to join in the spring. The Navigators' spring semester of study will focus on a particular book, Phillipians, rather than the topical study that this past semester has generated.

"If anyone does come, we would invite them in and hope they're serious enough to come back," Spears said.

Don Fallon, coordinator for religious activities in the Office of Student Life, said that while he was available to help students on a search for the right Bible study group, he shouldn't be the final word in what studies are best.

"I could give students the name of the contact person for each group, but I can't give them the particulars of that study," Fallon said. "To some extent, I could help in that I know the major groups on campus, to give a picture of what the theology of the study is."

The most effective way for a student to find the Bible study suitable to them would be to research several studies, Fallon said.

"They should first research the group themselves," he said. "I would suggest that they check out a few of the studies, and know how they would fit into the group. I would support students in checking out several studies before they choose one."

Two main benefits exist for students looking to join a Bible study group, Fallon said.

"One reason is that the study might help them in their own faith development and build their knowledge about the Bible. It might lead them into a deeper understanding of their faith," he said. "The other reason is the opportunity to find a sense of community and a place where they might belong in a group. They might find some good friendships and support in study groups."

'The Messenger' loses theme of faith amid violence, poor acting

'The Messenger'

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With Hollywood's recent revival of the historic biography coming to the big screen, "The Messenger: The Story of Joan of Arc" makes a large statement about faith and the effort to preserve it.

"The Messenger: The Story of Joan of Arc," directed by Luc Besson, is set in the early 15th century and tells the true story of a young woman who is told by God to lead an army in the English occupation of France. The movie ultimately makes a strong statement about faith, but Besson wasted his time on using so-called big name actors and actresses on his rendition of a woman moved by her relationship with God.

Milla Jovovich, who portrays Joan of Arc, starred in Besson's 1997 science-fiction thriller "The Fifth Element" as Leeloo, a centuries-old religious icon whose sole purpose was to save the galaxy from evil. The character of Leeloo said little and let her facial expressions do the talking for her. In "The Fifth Element," this worked for Jovovich.

She should have stuck to the silence in "The Messenger."

Jovovich's sad puppy-dog eyes and schoolgirl-like eagerness to be one of the boys in a world dominated by men made her nothing less than a weak portrayal of a saint. This bastardization of a great woman tainted my view of what I once saw as a great actress.

Just when one thinks things couldn't get worse, John Malkovich comes onto the scene. Although I immensely enjoy his previous works and consider him to be a respectable actor, Malkovich (as King Charles VII) doesn't even make an attempt to take on the personage of French royalty. His accent is all but nonexistent (as is the case with many characters in the movie), and his whining valley-girl tantrums make him seem more like a spoiled diva than a French king whose values are in turmoil.

The premise of the movie, however, is its saving grace: Joan of Arc is a woman who stopped at nothing to defend France and to serve as God's messenger. Her intense love for the Christian religion is one that caused Joan of Arc to be canonized in 1920, nearly 500 years after her death in 1431; she was burned at the stake by the Catholic Church after being placed on trial as a heretic.

People strong in faith can relate to Joan of Arc. A good portion of the movie is taken up by blood and gore on the battlefield, and Besson places too much focus on the violence surrounding the plight on Joan of Arc. However, the most emotional moments in the movie occur during the days leading up to Joan's trial and execution. Here, she is faced by a being known as "The Conscience" (stunningly portrayed by Dustin Hoffman), who challenges her faith to the point that Joan questions her own beliefs. With Hoffman present, the last half-hour of the movie presents a chilling battle between faith and one's own conscience. Being a true story, the results of this battle are too real themselves; Joan's faith wavers, and she compromises her beliefs to save her life.

While actors such as Jovovich and Malkovich make a farce of the story, the plot itself is enough to keep the film afloat and the audience's interest present. The story and idea of fighting for one's religion and the consequences of it are timeless and enough to make audience members strengthen in their own faith.

community that was very good to me and give something back there."

Watson accepted the law board's offer Monday night and announced it to Wichita police administrators Tuesday afternoon. He announced his decision at a speaking engagement in Wichita on Tuesday night.

The department's new director faces several challenges during his first few months on the job, including hiring an assistant director and moving the department to a new law enforcement center in west Manhattan.

RCPD Director Johnson, who retires Dec. 31, is friends with Watson and has volunteered to work past that date to make the transition easier.

Watson said his first task will be to meet officers, staff members and the community. He also said he will work quickly to hire an assistant director.

"The first thing I want to do is to get in and meet the staff and the people there in the department. I want to have discussions with them about their goals and their vision for the department," Watson said. "If there is any way possible, I'll take an inside candidate for assistant director."

At least one internal candidate has said he might try for the job. RCPD Capt. Steve French, who was one of the six finalists for director, said he met Watson last weekend and would like to try for the assistant director position.

"I plan to stay in support of Chief Watson and hopefully throw my hat into the ring for assistant director," French said. "We'll see what happens."

Watson said he will visit the department and search for a house this weekend while he's in Manhattan for the football game against the University of Missouri.

Watson had said he would run for Sedgwick County Sheriff in 2000 if he didn't get the Riley County job. Now, he said he will watch the process from afar.

"I'm not going to be an active player in that process," Watson said. "I'll just sit back and watch it with great interest."

the realization that this 11-year-old could kill."

Defense attorney Geoffrey Fieger, while admitting that the boy was out shooting that night, insisted that Nathaniel did not have the ability to form the criminal intent to commit murder.

He suggested Greene was hit accidentally while the boy was just shooting at trees.

The defense also produced three psychologists who testified that Nathaniel had limited powers of reasoning and the ability to understand the consequences of his actions.

"Would you want a group of 11-year-olds sitting on this jury? Deciding legal issues like intent?" Fieger had told jurors. "It would be absurd."

Today, he said the verdict was born out of anger.

"I think the rest of the world will scorn us and hold us in contempt," Fieger said.

In his instructions, Probate Judge Eugene Moore told jurors that when considering diminished mental capacity, they could take Nathaniel's age into account.."

classes, which are designed to help students utilize the skills discussed in their University Experience textbook.

"I have learned so much as an instructor for this class," Cleaver said. "The skills we teach are not only useful to freshman. Anybody at any level can benefit from the critical analysis the course promotes."

Cleaver said he recommends EUE to incoming freshmen because of the variety of opportunities that are offered. He said the course helps freshman make the big jump from high school to college and fosters the growth of a well-rounded, social and academic student.

"In an academic sense, the students will have the chance to truly look at their study habits and skills, see where they need improvement and then improve upon it," he said. "It 's no secret that high school and college are two completely different experiences. The course devotes a great deal of time in helping the students explore who they are as a person and how they can best make use of K-State's resources."

Kim Peschka, senior in political science, teaches a recitation class and a lab three days a week and has been an EUE instructor for three semesters. She said she learns a lot from the students with whom she works.

"Students are required to write short journal entries every week," she said. "That's probably my favorite part of grading. I get to see the world through their eyes, and more often than not, their perspectives are refreshing to me. I enjoy seeing them succeed after having completed my class."

Navigating a course

The PILOTS program at K-State, which is in its sixth year, started with about 75 students, said Anita Cortez, director of the PILOTS program. The numbers have doubled since then, with 150 students enrolled in the course.

"We are looking for students who might have a shaky start or a rougher transition," Cortez said. "We know that the freshman year is the most at-risk year, so we are trying to find students who might benefit from a little more support and structure."

Cortez said the program offers smaller, general education classes and interaction with instructors. The PILOTS courses incorporate writing and computer work into the assignments so students have a useful way to study information besides taking an exam, she said.

It is not uncommon for PILOTS program students to be some of the most successful students at K-State, Cortez said.

"We have students who make the president's honor roll every semester," she said. "We have 4.0s, we have McNair Scholars and students headed to grad school. There are lots of reason students might need extra support, and we try to provide that. My students are no more at-risk than other students who might qualify but are not in the program."

She said PILOTS students have leadership as well as academic strengths. The name PILOTS fits, Cortez said, because of the goals of the program.

"A pilot has to navigate its journey, has to have a map, know how to take off, and how to follow that map to reach their goals of achieving great heights," she said. "That's what freshman are trying to do. I think it is a good metaphor. Once they've come, and you have given them the chance to gain self confidence, you can't hold them back."

Other ways to succeed

Mike Lynch said there are more services K-State offers to encourage freshman success, such as the tutoring center, a student support services center and a program that works with minority students. He said there is no way to guarantee that every freshman who comes to K-State will succeed.

"The bottom line is that you're never going to get to the point that everybody who starts college is going to graduate," Mike Lynch said. "There's too many human factors involved. For a student who is not sure where they want to go, what they want to do, they are advised to lay out a while and get a focus on where they want to go, what they want to do, what they want out of life and then go here or somewhere else."

Boggs said his advice to freshmen who are having difficulty is to believe in themselves and speak their minds.

"Get help when you need it and don't carry it all on your own shoulders," he said. "The university is big and doesn't care if they have one less person attending it. Believe in your friends and become social within your department, organizations, roommates, friends and everything around you."

THEATERS

White said she probably would wait until a movie comes out on video, or she would attend a matinee show.

"I probably wouldn't even go to a movie at night now," White said. "I would probably wait until it comes out on tape, but I'd probably go to the $1.50 theater."

Smitley said the idea of a second-run theater should appeal to college students.

"We are making the opportunity to second-run pictures at a much reduced price," Smitley said.

Now, instead of showing the latest releases, this week Westloop 6 Theatres is showing the following: "The 13th Warrior," "Mickey Blue Eyes," "Mumford," "Deep Blue Sea," "Teaching Mrs. Tingle" and "Inspector Gadget."

The idea of a $1.50 theater intrigued other students. Owen Kelly, freshman in open option, said he was pleased that the $1.50 theater was coming back.

"I think it is good that we have an old theater," Kelly said. "I always liked going to Aggieville."

Egypt seeks to continue crash investigation amid suspicion of criminal act

BY MICHAEL J. SNIFFEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The FBI was preparing Tuesday to take over the EgyptAir Flight 990 investigation, indicating suspicions the crash was a criminal act, but the move was delayed at the request of Egypt.

U.S. officials sought to have the FBI take control of the investigation from the National Transportation Safety Board amid indications someone in the cockpit prayed just before the jet went into its fatal plunge, The Associated Press learned.

NTSB chairman Jim Hall said additional Egyptian experts were joining the investigation.

"Given this further development, it is only prudent for the National Transportation Safety Board to fully evaluate this information prior to any final decision on whether the responsibility for this investigation should transfer to the Federal Bureau of Investigation," Hall said.

He told a news conference he spoke Tuesday with FBI Director Louis Freeh, who agreed.

Hall said the government would hire a private salvage concern to retrieve the airplane wreckage from the ocean floor. He said officials were particularly interested in the cockpit.

The timing of the prayer — before the jet's autopilot was disengaged and the plane dived from 33,000 feet — raised suspicions that Flight 990 was deliberately brought down.

Hall said further analysis of the cockpit voice recorder was needed on the meaning of the prayer.

"As long as there are differences in the interpretation — and there are significant differences in the cultural interpretations of some expressions on the recorder — I think it is unfair ... for us to characterize it," he said.

Egyptian officials sought and received a delay of several days in the turnover, a law enforcement source said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The source said Egyptian experts wanted more time to analyze the apparently religious remarks on the cockpit tape so they might contribute more information.

Earlier Tuesday, two U.S. officials speaking on condition of anonymity, said the FBI would take over the investigation. "The NTSB investigates accidents, the FBI investigates other things," said one of the officials.

The prayer was apparently spoken by someone in the co-pilot's seat, but it was unclear whether it was the co-pilot.

A source close to the investigation told the AP that Egyptian airline officials tentatively identified the person in the co-pilot's seat as the relief co-pilot, Gameel El Batouty, 59. They identified his voice after listening to the cockpit voice recorder at NTSB headquarters.

The evidence of the prayer and its timing emerged when information from the flight data recorder was synchronized with sounds picked up by the cockpit voice recorder, Clinton administration officials told the AP.

The wording of the prayer was not disclosed.

Although the phrase heard on the cockpit recorder was characterized as a prayer, that doesn't necessarily mean it was related to the cause of the plunge. Arabic speakers commonly make references to God in everyday statements, and this is particularly true of Egyptians. For instance, the phrase "inshallah," or "God willing," is frequently used in everyday conversation for the most mundane statements.

Investigators from the NTSB and FBI with Arabic interpreters were continuing to analyze the plane's "black box" tapes to learn more about the meaning of the prayer and whether it was connected to the disaster.

Yusri Hamid, an EgyptAir pilot who often flew with the two pilots assigned to Flight 990, said Tuesday that neither Capt. Ahmed el-Habashy nor co-pilot Adel Anwar would intentionally or erroneously cause the plane to crash. Hamid, 59, dismissed speculation that the prayer could indicate the plane was crashed as part of a suicide mission.

"Any pilot who sees he is heading toward trouble will say religious prayers, whether he is a Muslim or a Christian," Hamid said.

The plane, bound for Cairo, crashed about 40 minutes after taking off from New York.

The flight data recorder shows the Boeing 767 was cruising normally at 33,000 feet until its autopilot was turned off, its nose pointed sharply down, its throttles cut back and engines shut off. The plane then rose from the dive and gained height briefly before breaking up and crashing about 60 miles south of the Massachusetts island of Nantucket.

Some American pilots have said they cannot think of an emergency situation that would prompt the crew to take those steps.

A senior intelligence official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said there still was no clear evidence that terrorism was involved.

President Clinton, during his trip to Turkey, was briefed Tuesday by National Security Adviser Sandy Berger on what has been learned and on the course of the investigation.

Freeh had met Tuesday with Attorney General Janet Reno to go over final arrangements for the transfer of the investigation, an administration official said.

EgyptAir pilot defends navigators of doomed flight

BY SALAH NASRAWI
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAIRO, Egypt — Despite an FBI probe into the case, an EgyptAir pilot who often flew with the two pilots assigned to Flight 990 believes neither would intentionally or erroneously cause the plane to crash.

Reasons for their actions — including shutting down both engines — can be explained, said Yusri Hamid, if they needed to slow the plane following an explosion or another catastrophic event.

"I know them very well and I know their capabilities and their skills," Hamid said Tuesday of Capt. Ahmed el-Habashy and copilot Adel Anwar. "Neither would have done such a thing" as intentionally crash the plane, he said.

The FBI has taken over the crash investigation, Clinton administration officials said Tuesday, an indication that authorities believe the plane may have been brought down by a criminal act.

According to a source close to the probe, someone in the cockpit — apparently someone in the copilot's seat — uttered a prayer before the jet's autopilot disengaged and it began its fatal plunge. The wording of the prayer was not immediately disclosed.

Hamid dismissed speculation that the prayer could indicate the plane was crashed intentionally as part of a suicide mission.

"Any pilot who sees he is heading toward trouble will say religious prayers, whether he is a Muslim or a Christian," said Hamid, a 59-year-old veteran who has clocked some 5,000 flight hours on a Boeing 767.

"If the pilot did turn off the autopilot it means there was a problem and he was trying to solve it," he said. "If you are in a dangerous position and you do not know what to do, you may do almost anything."

The flight data recorder shows the plane was cruising normally at 33,000 feet until its autopilot was turned off, its nose pointed sharply down, its throttles cut back and engines shut off. The plane then rose from the dive and gained height briefly before breaking up and crashing into the Atlantic Ocean, killing all 217 people on board.

Some American pilots have said they cannot think of an emergency situation that would prompt the crew to take those steps.

But Hamid said there were possible explanations, including that the pilots cut the engines to try to slow a downward plunge.

supplemented with a better underwriting department, which is similar to advertising.

"I think if the station increased the underwriting department, it could really help out with those expenses and give students the opportunity for hands-on experience working for a radio station," Mary Bosco, committee member, said.

The committee also voted to grant Lafene Health Center $55,426.83 in emergency funds for Y2K equipment purchases and upgrades.

The money is considered an emergency and will be taken out of reserve funds, which will not affect student privilege fees, Walker said.

The committee chose to subtract $10,000 from the original request because Lafene Health Center had budgeted $10,000 for Y2K expenses. The unforeseen cost of the upgrade amounted to $55,426.83. An emergency request for funds is intended to cover unforeseen expenses that would damage the entity or business if not paid, Walker said.

"We had to upgrade to keep the system running. The new software we were purchasing for Y2K would not run on the old hardware," said Sally Sowell, director of administrative services for Lafene.

Deputy shot dead Tuesday

■ Morganville officer fatally shot searching for escaped inmate; shooter, owner of gun not named.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MORGANVILLE, Kan. — A sheriff's deputy was fatally shot as he attempted to serve a warrant for an escaped jail inmate inside a house, a Kansas Bureau of Investigation spokesman said.

The inmate, Jeffery Hebert of Morganville, 22, was in custody following the shooting about 4:30 p.m. Tuesday, KBI Agent Scott Teeselink said. He had not been charged with any other crime as of this morning.

The sheriff's deputy was James "Monk" Kenney, 62.

Hebert was one of three men who escaped Monday night from the Cloud County Jail in Concordia, Teeselink said. The other two were captured Monday night. Hebert, who was being held in Clay County on Wednesday, was serving time for violating probation for possession of marijuana.

When asked whose gun was used or if it was believed that Hebert fired it, Teeslink said, "I don't have that information. They were executing a search warrant at that residence for him."

Teeselink also said this morning that he did not know how many people were inside the house. Radio station KCLY in Clay Center reported that it was Hebert's house.

Cloud County Sheriff's Investigator Steven Rupert said Hebert escaped about 9:30 p.m. Monday along with Thomas E. Smith Jr., of Clyde, and Russell T. Britt, of Concordia.

Smith, 22, and Britt, 19, were captured Monday night. Smith was arrested at a friend's home, and Britt was arrested while trying to get to a relative's home in Clyde. Rupert said both were charged with aggravated escape from custody and aggravated assault on a corrections officer.

The three inmates escaped by overpowering a corrections officer and breaking out of the jail's main window, falling 10 feet to the ground. Rupert said the three suffered slight scrapes, while the officer had slight injuries.

Smith was being retained on charges of aggravated criminal sodomy and aggravated indecent liberties with a child. Britt was being retained for violation of probation for burglary, Rupert said.

Morganville is located about 30 miles northwest of Manhattan, in northeast Kansas.

LeaderShape conference set for Manhattan

■ K-State to select 60 students to discuss range of experiences.

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A national leadership conference will be coming to K-State next spring to help students become better leaders.

The inaugural K-State LeaderShape Institute will be at Rock Springs 4-H Center on May 15-20.

Amy Donahy, staff member at the Office of Leadership Studies and Programs, said a group of faculty members and students who had been to the national LeaderShape Institute in Champaign, Ill. decided they wanted to bring a campus session to K-State.

Jason Heinrich, student body president, said he and others had a great experience at the national conference because it helped expand their leadership capabilities. He said bringing the institute to K-State will give more student leaders the opportunity to learn.

"This is not only a great opportunity for students, but for K-State as well," Heinrich said. "When you get 60 students together and give them the opportunity to build relationships and talk about important issues, they will create a great vision for the campus in the future."

LeaderShape, Inc. is a national, nonprofit organization developed in 1986 to provide students ages 17 through 25 the opportunity to improve on key leadership issues — vision, integrity, partnerships and results. Sixty participants are accepted at each of the seven sessions during the summer.

Like at the national institute, 60 students will be selected for the K-State session, and Donahy said the committee is looking for students from all types of leadership backgrounds.

"Anyone is welcome to apply," Donahy said. "We want a broad range of people who have different levels of leadership now. The experienced people are just as important as those who have the Public housing board created

Decision to ease burden on City Commission; Peak to serve as temporary liaison to board

BY TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City commissioners created a board that will oversee public housing in Manhattan, delegating power to the Housing Authority Board of Commissioners rather than the City Commission.

According to U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development regulations, the board that oversees housing must include a tenant. Power was delegated to the board because there is no resident of public housing on the City Commission.

The board will be the policy and budget authority of public housing in the city.

Karen Davis, director of community development, said most other housing authorities in Kansas are governed by a board of commissioners, similar to the ordinance passed in Manhattan.

"This group will have the authority to do all those things and only deal with housing issues," she said.

The Public Housing Authority Advisory Board, which was abolished, had less power than the new board. Commissioner Carol Peak will serve as a temporary liaison between City Commission and the new board.

She said a commissioner will help the board through the transition.

"The City Commission has not been well enough informed and has not had time to devote to current housing issues," Peak said. "As the issues have become greater, it has become apparent that the current structure isn't adequate."

The city also is pursuing a charter ordinance that would allow the board to include seven members.

The charter ordinance would allow the city to become exempt from state statutes that require five board members.

Peak said she prefers a seven-member board that includes two tenants, one city commissioner and four members who are knowledgeable about housing.

"We want to let everyone know we are sensitive to the issues and we want to find the best resolution for our residents," she said.

Mary Jo Murphy, organizer of Speak United and coordinator of the Flint Hills Living Wage Coalition, said the commission's decision was a good start, but more changes are needed. She said the addition of a city commissioner will make the board less informal.

"I am hoping they will take this opportunity to make some changes and listen to the tenants' input and make some changes in the policy," she said. "One of the issues that tenants have brought up is that there is too much discretion on policies."

Murphy said she supports a seven-member board that includes two elected tenants. She said with a more powerful board, tenant complaints can be heard more easily.

"It is a good opportunity for us to communicate with them and have more input into the final decision," she said. "This is a shorter process. We are talking to the boss now."

Investigation into EgyptAir disaster tapes moves forward

■ Current theory incomplete, but tapes suggest pilot trying to regain control of airplane.

BY MICHAEL J. SNIFFEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A relief co-pilot alone in the EgyptAir cockpit said, "I made my decision now; I put my faith in God's hands" just before the jetliner began its fatal plunge, officials close to the investigation said Wednesday. Moments after the plane began to dive, the pilot returned to struggle — futilely — to pull out.

As Egyptian officials won time to send their own experts to review the cockpit voice recorder tape, a federal law enforcement official and other sources close to the investigation described the evidence Wednesday that led the United States to the verge of putting the FBI in charge of the inquiry as a potential criminal matter.

The current theory of the fate of EgyptAir 990, the Boeing 767 that plunged into the Atlantic Ocean off Massachusetts killing 217 people, is both tentative and incomplete, the law enforcement official stressed. Further electronic enhancement of the tape recording and input from the Egyptian experts could alter the sketchy understanding of what went on.

With no sign of any mechanical malfunction or explosion, investigators have been drawn to actions of the crew as captured on the cockpit voice recorder and synchronized with the plane's movements preserved in the flight data recorder.

The law enforcement official, commenting only on condition of anonymity, and other sources close to the case gave this account of what those recorders show:

Relief co-pilot Capt. Gameel el-Batouty, scheduled to take over much later in the 11-hour New York-to-Cairo flight, enters the cockpit and asks to fly. His request is accepted.

The cockpit door is opened later, after which there is no conversation, leading investigators to conclude el-Batouty is alone.

He says in Arabic: "I made my decision now. I put my faith in God's hands."

Shortly thereafter, the autopilot is turned off and the jet begins to descend steeply from 33,000 feet.

The cockpit door opens again. Investigators believe the pilot, Capt. Ahmed Mahmoud el-Habashy, has returned because he is heard to ask what's going on. They believe he tries to regain control because he is heard to say, "Pull with me. Help me. Pull with me." There is no sound of struggle, but some investigators believe that phrase is said in an argumentative tone.

Local communication center would include TV, radio stations

BY LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The new Manhattan Community Communication Center wouldn't be an average media outlet.

The center, would feature a television station, a radio station and a Web site entirely based around community news. It would be operated by a conglomerate of K-State, the city of Manhattan, Multimedia Cablevision and a nonprofit organization that would be created specifically to help run the communication center.

Dennis Franz, director of curriculum and electronic publishing team at K-State-Salina, worked on a similar project while he was an instructor at Colby Community College, teaching radio and television.

"I integrated the students from a 100-watt radio station to a 100,000-watt radio station to serve the public. We became one of the top broadcasting schools in the country and appeared on the Late Show with Tom Snyder," Franz said.

From his success at Colby, he came to Salina to earn his Ph.D. He and Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, wrote the proposal for the Manhattan center together.

The team showed the proposal to City Commissioner Ed Klimek, a former broadcaster.

"He was pleased with it," Franz said.

Franz said the next step is for Klimek to show the proposal to the other city commissioners in hopes of getting the project started.

Purchase of gun increases risk of suicide, study finds

A study found that suicide was the leading cause of death among gun buyers in the first year after the weapon was purchased, accounting for 25 percent of all deaths.

Dr. Garen J. Wintemute and colleagues at the University of California at Davis found that buying a handgun is associated with an increased risk of suicide by firearm or by any method. Their study was published in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine.

The researchers studied deaths among 238,292 people who bought a handgun in California in 1991, and compared the buyers to the general population through 1996.

The first week proved to be a critical period. A person who buys a handgun was found to be 57 times more likely than a member of the general population to commit suicide within a week of purchasing the weapon.

Ramseys encourage police not to cease investigation

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — JonBenet Ramsey's parents say they hope the investigation into their 6-year-old daughter's slaying continues, and that publication of their forthcoming book helps fuel it.

"What we wanted and what we continue to want is that the investigation continues, that it be staffed with people that are really experienced in homicides and this type of crime," John Ramsey told WSMV-TV in Nashville in an interview broadcast Tuesday night. "The last thing we want to have happen is for the investigation to be shelved."

JonBenet's strangled and beaten body was found in the basement of the family's Boulder, Colo., home Dec. 26, 1996. Authorities say she also might have been sexually assaulted.

A grand jury last month ended its 13-month investigation without an indictment, but Colorado authorities say the Ramseys remain under suspicion.

Wichita council takes steps to ban public nudity in city

WICHITA — Saying nudity might represent European culture but not Midwestern values, city council members have taken action to put a wrap on public nudity.

By a 5-1 vote, the city council Tuesday night gave initial approval to banning all forms of public nudity. Supporters said the ban is needed to eliminate topless bars and curb sexual activities in public parks.

However, one nudist, wearing a suit, pleaded with the council to reconsider.

Mike Jan, founding member of the Air Capital Nature Society, said the ban "might drastically interfere with our lifestyle as nudists."

He found one supporter in council member George Rogers, who voted against the ban.

Rogers said the ban would allow him to mow his lawn with his shirt off, but prevents his wife from doing the same. He questions the legality of the ordinance.

Wichita's ban would prohibit the display of genitals or female breasts in public, with some exceptions. Excluded are theatrical productions, public restrooms and hospitals. Children younger than 10 also are exempted.

Eurostar to permit females to dress in trousers at work

LONDON — The company that operates passenger trains through the Channel Tunnel ended weeks of dispute with two female employees Wednesday by agreeing that they could wear trousers to work.

Security guards Debbie Sheen, 37, and Lynn McKay, 35, were threatened with disciplinary action and sent home from work last month when they refused to wear skirts during their shift at the Eurostar terminal at London's Waterloo Station.

The women said trousers were both more comfortable and more appropriate, but Eurostar countered that female security guards should wear skirts in the passenger security area for ease of recognition as much as smartness.

Both Eurostar, which runs high speed rail services between London, Paris and Brussels, and its security contractor, Securitas, said Wednesday that subsequent surveys of staff and passengers showed that many supported offering women the option of wearing trousers.

Eurostar said it had instructed Securitas to amend its uniform code, and said the two women were free to return to work.

Abuse case against minister dismissed in Massacusetts

BOSTON — The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court dismissed a child abuse charge against a minister who spanked his son, ruling Wednesday that child welfare officials provided inadequate evidence.

Donald Cobble, a minister from Woburn, said he spanked his 12-year-old son once to twice a month with the end of a leather belt to instill discipline.

The Department of Social Services filed an abuse finding against Cobble but offered to drop the charge if he agreed to stop spanking. He refused. Lawyers for the state argued the spanking raised substantial risk of physical injury to the boy.

The high court ordered the department's finding vacated.

"Today, we conclude only that, on the totality of the record presented in this case, the effects of the plaintiff's physical discipline on his minor child did not satisfy the department's own regulatory definitions of physical injury and abuse," the court ruled.

"However, a method of corporal punishment similar to the plaintiff's could, in different circumstances, rise to a level of severity that would result in the actual infliction of impermissible injuries," the court added.

FLAGFUN

4 K-State flag football teams to compete at regional matches in Lincoln, Neb., this weekend

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Wildcats will not be the only K-State football team on the gridiron this weekend.

Four flag football teams — Kappa Alpha Theta, Alpha Chi Omega and two mens' teams, The Naked Bootleggers and Polk High — will represent K-State at the 1999 Target Flag Football Regional Tournament in Lincoln, Neb., this weekend.

"We are more serious than ever about playing football," said Anne Hays, intramural chairwoman for Theta and junior in elementary education. "Most of us never played this type of sport in high school, but right now, we can play with the rest of them."

The tournament, presented by Mentadent and Nestle Crunch, will be played in a round-robin format followed by a single elimination tournament Sunday. Trophies will be awarded to the winner of each division—men's, women's and co-rec—with the championship winners receiving an all-expense-paid trip to New Orleans. for the 21st Annual National Flag Football Championship, Dec. 26-30.

Hays said Theta has seen an increasing interest in flag football this year and had to add another team for both the intramural competition, sponsored by the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and Tau Kappa Epsilon League play. The TKEs sponsor a flag football league for sororities as part of their philanthropy, which Theta won this year.

"This is a sport where girls can and want to prove that they are just as good as the boys," Hays said. "It is also more difficult because of all the plays and defenses we have to memorize, so it is another challenge."

Hays said 15 teams have entered the tournament this year, and the four teams from K-State all participated last year. A fifth team, K-State Crew, won the regional championship for its division last year.

Jessica McPeake, quarterback for Thetas and senior in management information systems, said the team has the chance to win the championship.

"We have a good chance to get into the championship game if we play like I know we can," McPeake said. "It is not only a fun sport, but it has gained increasing interest in the house and has become one of our most competitive sports."

MIKE SHEPHERD/COLLEGIAN

Kappa Alpha Theta's Lori Gruenbacher, freshman in milling science, has her flag stripped away by Alpha Xi Delta's Stefanie McKenzie, junior in architecture, in a game of flag football Sept. 9. Theta and three other K-State teams will be competing in Lincoln, Neb., this weekend in the Target Flag Football Regional Tournament.

Lauren Bova, vice president of education for Alpha Chi and junior in advertising, said this is the third year the house has been in the tournament. She said the team, which placed first in the intramural league this semester, has been practicing for most of the year for the tournament and hopes to improve from last year's performance.

"This year, we had a lot more people interested in the team," Bova said. "I think that it has something to do with K-State's success and is an opportunity to try something we haven't had the chance to do in the past.

"Last year we didn't place in the tournament, so we are looking to do better this year."

Because only 12 people are eligible to be on the roster, Bova said the Alpha Chi and Theta teams have been scrimmaging together for the past couple of weeks to prepare for the game.

"The Thetas have a really good team, and we have been scrimmaging with them in order to prepare for Lincoln," Bova said. "It is great that we have two sorority teams representing K-State this year."

Hays said she hopes as many people as possible will support the team in Lincoln this weekend, but with house activities and the home football game against Missouri, she said she only knew of a couple of car loads that were making the trip.

"I know there would be more coming if it were not for the home game this weekend," Hays said. "Several are coming to see us on Sunday, but we are bummed that there are so many conflicts preventing more from coming. However, we know the house and the girls are behind us."

McPeake said having the chance to play teams from around the region is a great opportunity not only for the fun, but because of the increase in competition.

"This is a neat experience to compete on a level outside of K-State," McPeake said. "This year there will be more teams with more competition. We are very excited."

Fraternity restructuring with goal-oriented program

BY JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A two-year restructuring effort by the K-State chapter of Beta Theta Pi is taking on a new look.

Beta is establishing a Men of Principle Initiative to incorporate some common goals back into its chapter.

"The Men of Principle Initiative is basically an attempt to bring all the chapters back to the core foundings and beliefs that Beta was originally based on," said Trevor McKeeman, senior in business management and chapter president.

McKeeman said Beta has been restructuring since 1997, and the initiative is a way to make the chapter even stronger.

"The reason that this initiative was even proposed was because our general fraternity realized that fraternities are exposed to a lot of negative publicity, and they wanted to change that about the Beta chapters," McKeeman said.

The initiative has nine goals that are presented to the individual chapters so the chapters can format their own goals around them.

Some of the goals include cultivating intellect, shaping responsible leaders and showing a strong commitment to the community.

"After the general fraternity introduces us to the nine goals, the individual chapters create a strategic action plan, which covers the goals and problems of each chapter," McKeeman said.

The initiative is being introduced to Beta chapters all over the country to see where the program is going to be the strongest.

Martin Cobb, director of the initiative for Beta general fraternity, said 17 Beta chapters around the nation have adopted the initiative, and there have been some dramatic results.

"We have seen some very positive changes, such as a decrease in the amount of alcohol abuse and better upkeep of the houses," Cobb said.

The Men of Principle Initiative has nine goals that are presented to the individual chapters so the chapters can format their own goals around them. Some of the goals include cultivating intellect, shaping responsible leaders and showing a strong commitment to the community.

McKeeman said the K-State chapter of Beta is the fifth in the nation to try the initiative, and even though it still is in the developing stages, the initiative has fit well within the K-State chapter.

"We have been praised as a strong chapter by the general fraternity, so the Men of Principle Initiative seemed like a good thing for us," McKeeman said.

Ben Hemmen, junior in political science and member of Beta, said with all the time and effort Beta has put into the initiative, there is no reason it should not be a success.

"I love the idea," Hemmen said. "With all the bad press that fraternities get, the Initiative is something that was needed to bring us back to our values and to show what good opportunities fraternities really are."

Cobb said K-State has been one of the general fraternities premiere chapters for the past few years and that the initiative seemed to fit naturally here.

"K-State has served as a consistent fraternity for many years, and the Men of Principle Initiative can help make it even stronger," Cobb said.

McKeeman said he hopes the initiative catches on with other fraternities.

"The general fraternity has been entertaining other fraternities with the idea," McKeeman said. "I think that it would be a benefit to other fraternities because it outlines every aspect of a man's life and sets positive goals for the members."

UNITED AGAINST VIOLENCE

The Salvation Army needs your help!

Since opening our Manhattan Thrift Store, we have been overwhelmed by the quality and quantity of donations! (The people of Manhattan are very generous!) Our store is literally overflowing with more clothing than we can get sorted but which is too good to just sell for rags. How can you help?

First, come to our Grand Opening on November 19, 1999 (Tomorrow!)

- Buy all the unsorted clothing you can fit in a grocery sack for $2! TWO BUCKS!
- Special Grand Opening deals on our regular store merchandise!
- A free dinner for two at Carlos O-Kelly's for our 100th Grand Opening customer!
- Find that lamp, chair, end table, or even appliance that you've been wanting at a price you can actually afford!

Then, come back Saturday morning to our backdoor sale!

- The selection of a hundred yard sales, all in one place and at incredible prices.
- More unsorted clothing at $2 per bag (Trust us, we've got plenty!)

We could also use your help in other ways:

Come help us sort donations! Would you or your organization like to rack up some community service time? Call 539-9399 to schedule some time, from 1 hour on up. No special skills are required. Bring your friends and have a blast going through sacks and sacks of donated clothes. (It's a great way to find the best items before everybody else!)

Adult crimes worthy of adult punishment

Ronnie Greene lay bleeding outside a convenience store in suburban Detroit.

Only hours before, a bullet had whizzed past his head. He had thought the shooter was only fooling around then, so he had yelled a few words and let the situation go.

This time, two shots were heard, one striking Greene in the head. He fell to the ground and, within hours, was dead.

His killer was captured and charged with murder. Authorities dug up a record of 22 police contacts on the murderer — five involving a gun. In one instance, he had chased a bus driver down with a .22 caliber rifle. He also had beaten another person with a steel pipe.

On Tuesday, when he was convicted of second-degree murder, human-rights activists such as Amnesty International condemned the conviction — as well as the trial.

All because the killer was 13 years old.

The defense in the case allowed that Nathaniel Abraham, at the age of 11, shot Greene down from 300 feet away. It claimed, however, that Nathaniel was shooting at trees and the bullet ricocheted.

But the controversy surrounding this case is not a matter of if Nathaniel did it or even if he meant to do it. Critics say a boy such as Nathaniel is not capable of realizing the consequences of his actions. They claim that trying a child as an adult is too harsh, no matter what the crime.

But a murder is a murder.

Parents don't make their children kill. Society does not make a boy shoot a man. When someone kills another person, the justice system should focus on the nature of the crime, not the mentality or age of the killer.

As Judge Eugene Arthur Moore considers whether the convicted murderer should be sentenced as an adult or as a child, it is to be hoped the face of Ronnie Greene will surface over and over. Instead of trying to imagine Nathaniel having to endure prison for the rest of his life, the judge should imagine Greene being shot at three times in the same day and lying on the concrete with his life slowly draining out of him.

The judge simply could sentence a killer to prison until he's 21, or even to time already served. Would that be the case if the killer was 30? It's unlikely.

If the child is going to commit an adult crime, he should be given an adult sentence.

Ronnie Greene deserves his life back. Nathaniel Abraham deserves life in prison.

If Unix could have spoken that night in October, that is what it would have said.

The message said the sender was "Homeboy."

Well, Homeboy's real name was "Matt." Never mind, "Matt" wasn't even his real name.

When I clicked on the message, I was greeted with instant flattery.

According to "Matt," I was the most beautiful woman on campus. He then went into very vivid detail about what he wanted to do to me. A complete stranger was telling me where he wanted to touch, kiss and suck on me.

"Matt" had written the following: "I kiss up your leg, licking up your calves, knees, to your inner thigh where I kiss softly, touching my tongue to it. Kissing up your leg further, I move up to your stomach and start to kiss softly ... lifting up your shirt higher as I move. Finally your shirt comes off ..."

You get the point.

My first thought was, I am going to kick someone's butt. I ran through my mental list of my friends I had recently played a practical joke on.

So I made my first mistake. I replied.

The reason I replied was to figure out which one of my friends thought this absolutely disgusting e-mail was humorous.

My little friend told me that he lived in Wichita and graduated from K-State, but had me in one of his classes.

Does anyone else catch the lie? Either he liked to commute, was taking a class he didn't need since he had already graduated or he was lying. But no one ever fudges on the wild, wild Web.

Once I caught "Matt" in that lie, he apologized. He wrote something about nerves, how he really was in one of my classes.

More than 10 e-mails later, I was beginning to realize that this wasn't one of my friends behind the "joke."

Everyday activities like walking to class, even sitting in class, resulted in my searching for the creep instead of taking notes.

Yet it didn't completely sink in how psycho "Matt" was until I was at my friend's house.

I was talking to a friend of a friend when I mentioned this creepy guy who was sending me e-mails.

As I was showing a few of my friends the e-mails, suddenly another girl comes forward.

"Oh my God! I got that same first e-mail," she screamed.

The feces hit the fan, so to speak.

I sent "Matt" an e-mail questioning how many other girls he wanted to kiss and suck on in inappropriate places.

Then I was contacted by the campus police.

It hit me then that this wasn't a joke — some pervert out there had written such filth to me.

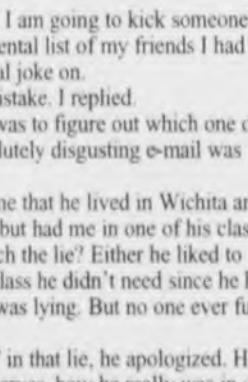
Never was this a humorous incident in my eyes, but this was the last straw. This was someone I didn't even know. This wasn't a friend who was secretly plotting my revenge.

I pressed charges.

The reason? I didn't want anyone else to think it was a joke, or even far worse, a romantic interest.

Fifty-nine other women at K-State were subjected to thinking someone was who he really wasn't.

If I could go back, I wouldn't have replied to "Matt." I would have known that even my friends wouldn't think of stooping that low.



Yet I still have a few things to say to my pal, "Matt."

How could you send something so disgusting to 60 women you didn't even know? How can you look in the mirror without feeling like you've made so many women paranoid and uneasy?

Oh, and another thing. It's perverts like you who give the Internet a bad name.

Question, answer both clear in looming recall election of McCulloh

TRAVIS D. LENKNER

To talk to City Commissioner Karen McCulloh on the telephone or meet her in person, you'd never know she worshiped Satan. But, in quiet murmurings at coffee shops and in hushed conversations in checkout lines, that's what they whisper about McCulloh.

She worships Satan.

She supports child pornography.

She's not a good Christian.

They whisper behind her back and sometimes they say it to her face. McCulloh isn't sure how much more she can take. Her sweet, singsong voice changes its tune when she talks about the Dec. 7 election that could kick her off the Manhattan City Commission. She is sad when she tells you about friends and neighbors who are leading the drive to oust her because she voted to remove the Ten Commandments monlolith from in front of City Hall last spring.

You can hear the pain in Karen McCulloh's voice, and it's for real.

"I have a sense of honor in what I've done for this community," she said, "and I'm getting beat up pretty bad. To say that doesn't hurt, well ..."

In the name of free speech, honorable public servants and good old common decency, McCulloh needs your help.

But let's start from the beginning — from that day in April when they crowded the City Commission meeting room and quoted from their Bibles while babies cried and tempers flared and commissioners wondered how to make sense of it all.

The Ten Commandments monolith was a gift to the city from the Fraternal Order of the Eagles in 1958. Forty years later, the stone tablets were moved to the front of newly renovated City Hall.

Some folks had a problem with that.

They called the American Civil Liberties Union. They took their case to the City Commission. They demanded action.

And McCulloh, with her long record of public service in Manhattan and Riley County, did what she thought was best. She voted — with commissioners Bruce Snead and Carol Peak — to give the monolith back to the Eagles.

Some folks had a problem with that, too. Now, McCulloh's commission seat and her character are on the line.

Those folks collected signatures, filed a petition and won the right to a recall election on Dec. 7.

McCulloh appealed the recall, calling it silly that citizens could recall her just because some of them disagreed with her vote on one issue. If that's legal, she said, any elected official is in danger anytime they cast a vote.

"The ultimate authority should rest with the people, but I think the regular election is the best time to do that unless you have somebody doing something egregious," McCulloh said. "I think this is misuse of the recall. It's to punish me, and I don't think that's why you recall someone."

A district judge, foolishly, disagreed. He let the petition continue — the petition that accuses McCulloh of violating the First Amendment by trying to make secular humanism the official Manhattan religion when she removed the Commandments.

That's a poor legal maneuver, but it worked. Now McCulloh listens to the whispers about her in the checkout line and she sees the yard signs and the newspaper ads, and she wishes it all would just go away.

"I'm very tired," she said. "When you've dedicated years of service to the community, this is really hard."

The recall proponents have made it their goal to use misinformation to bring voters to the polls.

Their newspaper ads talk about her votes on other issues, and some don't even mention the Ten Commandments.

The real issue in the Dec. 7 election has been replaced by gossip about McCulloh's personal life, her votes on other issues and, yes, even whether she's a good Christian (She's a member of the Episcopal Church).

"They can't distinguish between the fact that I don't think it's appropriate to have the Ten Commandments there and the fact that I think the Ten Commandments are a very good set of guidelines," McCulloh said. "I don't argue the worth of the Ten Commandments at all. I think they think I'm stating that their faith is wrong, and that's not true," she said.

There's the yard signs — green and white and popping up all over town. "Vote Yes On Dec. 7 — Just Because," they say.

Then there's the real dilemma: What's the question we're supposed to answer when we check yes or no?

"I've been in public office for a long time, and I've voted on things people did not agree on, but this is supposed to be whether I committed misconduct on the Ten Commandments," McCulloh said. "It's not supposed to be a referendum on my life."

It's simple: Did Karen McCulloh work to establish secular humanism when she voted to remove the Commandments, and should she be recalled because of it?

Yes?

Or no.

Register to vote.

And vote no on Dec. 7.

Student distressed about number of core business classes offered

Editor,

I am writing this letter to bring to your attention a current problem in the College of Business Administration. I am concerned with the low number of core business classes offered at K-State. As a junior in financial services, I have encountered the difficulty of getting into business classes that are prerequisites for more advanced business classes. Example courses are Business and Economic Statistics I, Accounting for Business Operations and Accounting for Investing and Financing. The number of seats offered for these classes are well below the number needed. The difficulty of getting into classes makes it even harder to graduate on time.

I think there is a need either to put more money toward hiring additional instructors for these classes, or to have the current instructors teach more sections. I believe this problem is one that needs to find a solution.

Homecoming chair encourages students to voice suggestions

Editor,

First of all, I would like to thank every organization that participated in Homecoming this year.

It was a fun-filled week with plenty of spirit and enthusiasm.

However, there still are many things to improve upon for future Homecomings at K-State.

I encourage you to join the All-University Homecoming Committee for a Homecoming evaluation at 6 p.m. Monday in the Union Big 12 Room.

We're looking for input from the student body, so I urge anyone with ideas or thoughts to join us.

The agenda includes evaluating Homecoming 1999, generating event ideas for the future and brainstorming ways to include the entire campus.

We tried a few new approaches this year and would like some feedback on whether to continue those ideas.

Also, we would like your input on how we can build alumni participation during the week.

The KSU Alumni Association has done some extensive research on other university's homecoming activities, and I will share with you that information.

K-State does some of the standard homecoming activities, but there are ways to enhance what we're already doing.

Please join the committee and other campus groups to make Homecoming weeks successful and fun for all K-Staters. See you Monday night.

Deadline nears for McCain ambassador applications

BY SARA MARTIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An appreciation of the arts and a desire to be involved firsthand in representing McCain Auditorium productions to the public are all that is needed to apply to be a McCain ambassador for spring semester.

"The intent is really to be a student arm of the activities that occur in McCain, and not just the performance series," said LaBarbara Wigfall, associate professor of landscape architecture and former adviser of the McCain ambassador program. "It's to look at a broad spectrum of the arts — not just classical art, but all art forms."

Ambassadors have many responsibilities to McCain performances, as well as to any event sponsored by McCain. Their activities include ushering and working coat check at shows, posting fliers and chalking sidewalks, working at McCain-sponsored children's activities and acting as docents for the McCain holiday home tours. They also are hosts to performers and are escorts for senior citizens attending McCain performances. They learn McCain history to answer questions and often walk patrons to their vehicles after shows for safety. Ambassadors helping at a performance usually have the opportunity to watch the show.

"It's very much community service in helping people and entertaining," Thom Jackson, assistant director of McCain, said. "On the other hand, it's a great way to come see shows."

Applications can be picked up from the McCain box office or in Bluemont 369 and are due by Dec. 3. Wigfall said the group is looking for students with some experience in any field of art.

"The history of the organization is that students show interest prior to the application, that there is some track record on some aspect of the arts and not just 'I saw two shows at McCain this year,'" Wigfall said.

The five current ambassadors will review the applications and select up to 10 new ambassadors.

"We need someone who appreciates the arts and has confidence they can explain it to someone else. It's hard to be ambitious if you're not enthusiastic about the arts," Wigfall said. "We're asking these students to take a much more active role in their involvement."

Applications include short essay questions pertaining to prior experience in the arts and the applicants' commitment to the arts.

"They should talk about how the arts enrich their lives and why it is important, when in an educational setting, that students gain experience beyond the classroom in the arts," Wigfall said. "College is about a broad appreciation of a number of things we normally wouldn't be exposed to, and McCain is that opportunity."

In the past, McCain has had as many as 24 ambassadors. Wigfall said the group decided to downsize a few years ago so a few members could be more committed, but there simply are too many activities to handle for the current five ambassadors. Another problem is that many of these members have graduated or are graduating soon.

"There's been a large core group over the last two years, but most of them have graduated," Jackson said. "It's also good to have some new blood, as well."

Students chosen can remain an ambassador for as long as they are a student.

"We'll take anything we can get," Jackson said. "If it's a semester, that's great. If it's longer, even better."

There will be an informational meeting for current or prospective ambassadors tonight at 6 p.m. in McCain Auditorium to discuss different aspects of the job.

Minimal drinking could reduce risk of stroke

BY BRIGITTE GREENBERG
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

As little as a single glass of wine or beer per week can significantly reduce a man's risk of a stroke, according to the biggest study ever to examine the link.

The study found that light to moderate drinkers can lower their risk by about 20 percent compared with teetotalers. It involved more than 22,000 men, but one of the researchers said the results also could apply to women.

Many studies have shown that modest drinking reduces the risk of heart disease. Until now, the evidence of an effect on strokes has been less convincing.

The American Heart Association estimates that 600,000 people in the United States suffer a stroke each year. It is the third leading cause of death in this country, and the leading cause of serious, long-term disability.

Earlier studies were criticized because they simply compared drinkers to nondrinkers. This latest study, published in today's New England Journal of Medicine, examined varying levels of alcohol intake.

It found that between one drink a week and one a day reduces the risk, and the lesser amount was about as good as the higher one.

There were not enough heavy drinkers in the study to look at the effects of more than one a day, but the heart association warns drinking to excess can raise blood pressure and, in fact, lead to a stroke.

The study's authors stressed that it would be unwise for doctors to advise patients who don't drink to start suddenly or for those who drink small amounts to begin consuming more heavily. The study found no added protection from stroke by drinking more than light to moderately.

The study's authors stressed that it would be unwise for doctors to advise patients who don't drink to start suddenly or for those who drink small amounts to begin consuming more heavily.

"Absolutely it has benefits, but it also has harm," said study co-author Julie E. Buring, an epidemiologist at Harvard-affiliated Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston.

She and other researchers warned of liver damage, the dangers of driving while drunk and the risks to fetuses of drinking while pregnant. What's more, there are other ways reduce stroke risk, such as quitting smoking or lowering blood pressure.

Researchers attribute alcohol's benefits to its ability to increase the amount of HDL, or good cholesterol, in the bloodstream. HDL cholesterol helps keep arteries clean. Researchers also said that alcohol can break up blood clots.

The men studied all were doctors between the ages of 40 to 84 who took part in the Physicians' Health Study, which began in 1982. They were tracked for about 12 years. In all, the study subjects reported 679 strokes.

Small amounts of alcohol were shown to decrease the risk of ischemic stroke, which is the most common type and is caused by clots that reduce blood flow to the brain. Drinking had no effect on the risk of a rare hemorrhagic stroke, which is caused by sudden bleeding in the brain.

While Buring said the findings may apply to women as well, she stressed that light to moderate alcohol intake for a woman is defined as about one drink per day vs. approximately two drinks per day for a man.

Student Publications picks spring editor, ad manager

The Collegian's editor in chief and advertising manager positions for the spring semester were named Wednesday night.

Kellee Miller, junior in print journalism, will be the new editor in chief. She said it is something she has wanted to do since high school.

Miller, who has been on staff for three semesters, said the Collegian has a lot of great young writers.

She said it will be important to recruit staff writers and improve the staff's in-depth writing skills.

"We will devote a lot of time to the election and legislature this spring," Miller said. "I hope to see improvements in writing quality."

The change in staff positions every semester is an advantage of being involved with the Collegian, Miller said.

"There are a lot of opportunities to move up, and you can improve every semester," Miller said. "A lot of the writers will be more confident and will hopefully generate more story ideas."

The advertising manager position was earned by Jm Calvert, junior in marketing.

After working in sales during the past year, Calvert said he will use what he has learned to benefit the Collegian.

"I'm going to work to motivate the entire staff to sell and provide good incentives for businesses seeking to advertise," Calvert said.

When not in class, Calvert said he will be devoted to the newspaper.

"This is an increased workload, but I'm looking forward to the challenge," Calvert said.

Cats drop NIT game to Arizona

■ No. 10 team routs K-State in 1st round of tournament; turnovers plague Wildcats.

BY BOB BAUM
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TUCSON, Ariz. — Arizona's freshman backcourt of Jason Gardner and Gilbert Arenas scored 14 points apiece in their debut as the 10th-ranked Wildcats routed K-State 88-69 Tuesday night in the first round of the Preseason NIT.

Gardner scored 10 points in the first half and finished the game with nine assists and three steals. Arenas, who had narrowed his college choices to K-State and Arizona before deciding to go to Tucson, scored 12 points in the first half and finished with six assists and five steals.

Arizona took control with a 22-0 run late in the first half and led by as many as 32 in the second half to win its 33rd consecutive home game and goes for No. 34 against New Mexico State, which beat Hofstra 69-55, in the second round Friday night.

All five starters scored in double figures for Arizona.

Loren Woods, a 7-foot-1-inch transfer from Wake Forest, scored 15 points. Richard Jefferson had 15 points and 10 rebounds, and Michael Wright had 11 points and 10 boards.

Galen Morrison and Cortez Groves each scored 13 points for K-State, which committed 24 turnovers against the quick Arizona defense, including a zone that has rarely been used by coach Lute Olson.

Tony Kitt and Quentin Buchanan each added 11 points for K-State.

Arizona built its biggest lead at 69-37 on Gardner's layup with 11:59 to play.

K-State scored 11 straight points to cut the lead to 70-50 with 7:55 to play. An 11-4 Arizona spurt ended any faint K-State comeback hopes.

Arenas and Gardner each hit three-pointers in their first collegiate shots as Arizona took a 20-5 lead.

K-State made four three-pointers, two by Morrison, in a 19-9 run that cut the lead to 29-24 with 6:04 left in the half.

Arizona buried the visiting Wildcats with 22 consecutive points to go ahead 53-26 on Luke Walton's two free throws with 33 seconds left in the half.

After K-State's Kelvin Howell scored, Gardner used a head-fake to get open for a long jumper that he hit at the buzzer to put Arizona up 55-28 at halftime.

The first half featured two lobs from Arenas to Jefferson, one for a slam and the other for a soft layup. Jefferson also had a slam dunk on a lob from midcourt by Gardner with 6:20 left in the game.

K-State turned the ball over five straight times during the outburst, and 14 times in the first half.

Arizona shot 59 percent in the first half, compared with 29 percent for K-State.

Arizona last lost at home Feb. 13, 1997, 66-64 to UCLA.

Men's crew team battles through weather, lack of funds to compete around country

STORY BY ERICA COURTRIGHT

Although its members compete at the varsity level in the name of the Wildcats and practice six days a week, K-State's men's crew team receives no funding from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

In fall 1996, K-State's women's crew team made its debut as a funded varsity-level program. In years prior, both the men's and women's crew teams were organized under the Kansas State Rowing Association, but as a result of Title IX, the two programs were split. The women's team now is funded fully by the athletic department, while the men continue to support their own program.

K-State senior Jim Barnard, KSRA president, said funding is a big problem.

"The big disadvantage for our athletes themselves is that they have to pay for everything," Barnard said.

The KSRA is a university club that has an executive board along with two branches: university and community. High school rowers compete under the community side, while collegiate rowers fall under the university side.

The collegiate rowers break down into a novice team — made up of first-year, primarily freshmen rowers — and a varsity team of more experienced athletes. The team's head coach Alan Koch is aided by senior Seiji Ikeda, the varsity coach, and Barnard, who coaches the novice squad.

The KSRA does the majority of its recruiting in the fall semester, targeting incoming freshmen. The group utilizes an informational table at freshman orientation over the summer to identify prospective rowers. During the first week of fall classes, recruitment continues at the K-State Student Union and in the residence hall dining centers.

But recruitment is hurt by a lack of university funding.

Barnard said fund raisers and dues barely cover costs, leaving no funds to pay a full-time coach, and new equipment is not obtained easily.

Despite the setbacks of being unfunded, Jeff Tignor, crew member, said there are advantages to being identified by the university as a varsity sport. The men's team is allowed to share the boathouse with the women and work out in Brandeberry Indoor Complex; however, the men aren't allowed to use Vanier Football Complex or to utilize K-State's athletic trainers.

"It's a real thin line," Barnard said. "I'm not sure anyone really knows. I can wear a letter jacket, just like football players or basketball players, but I don't get to sit with the athletes at football games."

The men's crew team recently wrapped up the fall season with the Frostbite Regatta on Nov. 7 in Wichita. The first varsity four and the novice four boats both captured gold, while the first novice eight boat finished second and the varsity eight finished in fourth. This was the sixth and final regatta for the KSRA.

Earlier in the season, the team opened competition Sept. 25 at the Head of the Des Moines regatta in Iowa. The K-State squad finished no higher than sixth in any of the races, showing that conditioning and teamwork needed improvement.

At the Quad Cities regatta in Moline, Ill., the men's varsity eight boat captured the open eight title in a time of 15:09, defeating Kansas and Nebraska in the 2.5 mile race. The varsity four boat also finished third in a time of 17:12, while Kansas took the title.

The men's crew team continued competition at the Head of the Rock regatta on Oct. 10 in Rockford, Ill. A 10th place finish in the men's open four race was the best performance of the outing. Koch said the rowers were in fairly good form at this point in the season, but there was still a real need to develop endurance, strength and teamwork.

The novice team made its debut at the American Royal Fall Rowing Classic in Kansas City, Mo., on Oct. 17. In their first outing, the novices captured the top-two spots in the men's novice eight race. According to the team members, the performance was the best of the KSRA in recent memory.

The men's crew team traveled to the Head of the Iowa regatta on Oct. 31 to compete with 53 collegiate men's squads. K-State's highest finish came in the men's open four race, with a sixth place finish in a time of 15:13.

Beyond the team's success, Barnard said he just wishes K-State students would acknowledge the men's program.

"We're always shooting for publicity," he said. "More than anything we just want people to know we exist and know we're out there."

Lost amid complaints about men's basketball team lies largely unnoticed, dangerous women's squad

VIEWPOINT

SARAH CRAIG

Last weekend's devastation at Nebraska taught K-State a whole lot of lessons. One of these lessons can be applied in the near future — the lesson of the home-court advantage.

Similar to when Wildcat faithfuls paint their own football stadium purple, the sea of Huskers screamed and yelled and cheered their team on to a serious Cat-whoopin'.

K-State fans know full well how to do the same thing. But they haven't yet applied that ability to anything other than the football team.

People complain about the lackluster men's basketball team, seemingly forgetting that both genders play basketball. The women's team has a pretty interesting season ahead of it, featuring several top 25 teams as well as 22 teams that competed in post-season play last year.

They certainly could use a sea of Wildcats to overwhelm their opponents, both conference and non conference.

The Cats open the season Friday night against Drake, a team that beat them last season 88-67. But K-State women's basketball has changed significantly since then.

Gone are the injuries that plagued the team last season; in place of them are solid players on the court, starting with three senior post players with experience playing together and the ability to score, block and rebound. Center Olga Firsova holds the K-State record for blocks in one season with 49.

The Cats have hot three-point shooters in the starting lineup and off the bench as well as a point guard that runs the court in a way that K-State fans haven't seen in a while.

And Drake is no piece of cake, either.

The Bulldogs are the preseason favorite in Missouri Valley Conference this season, returning all five starters. Based on last year's game, chances are they're not expecting the kind of competition the Cats are prepared to give them.

Nor are they expecting many fans wearing purple, or fans, for that matter.

K-State fans know the difference it makes — many learned last weekend what it's like to walk into a hostile stadium and walk out heartbroken.

They also know what it's like to believe that, by sheer numbers alone, there's no way the opponent is walking away with a win this time.

Not here. Not in Wildcat territory.

Now, it's about that time of year when people start to realize that the football season is nearly over, that there will be no national championship for K-State this year, and that it's time to turn to the basketball court for sports entertainment.

Why not help the Cats get a head start by giving them the same advantage so faithfully given to the football team week after week?

Why not go cheer for a K-State team that leads the league in wins in the Big 12 Tournament?

Why not see what happens when a K-State crowd supports another team the way it supports K-State football?

K-State women's basketball is improving bit by bit, year after year; it hasn't been easy going since coach Deb Patterson took over, but the Cats have managed some big wins.

Last year, the Cats' biggest crowd at Bramlage was against then-No. 22 Kansas.

Surprisingly enough, the Cats won it. Coincidence? Doubtful.

It's more likely that the 8,015 fans cheering for K-State helped gain momentum every step of the way, not letting the Cats get discouraged when Kansas pulled ahead and screaming whenever K-State scored.

It's likely that screaming fans can do the same thing every game they attend.

Sex Week Success

Abstinence, homosexuality among topics of programs sponsored by residence halls

By CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sex education can be as close as in your own home.

This week, the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls sponsored Sex Week, in which each night of the week featured a different sex education-related activity.

Tonight's presentation by the STD, HIV, AIDS Peer Educators, which will take place at 7 in the Putnam Hall basement, will conclude the week's activities.

The purpose of these events is to educate students about sex-related topics, said Sarah Decke, KSUARH adviser and residence life coordinator for West Hall and Smurthwaite Scholarship House.

"Our goal is to raise awareness that having sex is more about getting pregnant or getting HIV," Decke said.

Monday kicked off Sex Week with a program titled "Let's Talk About Sex," which touched upon topics such as safe sex and abstinence.

"This year, ARH presented a program about abstinence," said Brandon Lowden, KSUARH campus issues coordinator and sophomore in psychology. "You hear a lot of talk about how to use condoms, but not much about abstaining from sex."

Lowden said Monday evening's program originally was not intended to be part of Sex Week, but as a floor event for a West Hall resident assistant.

"Originally, it was just supposed to be a program put on by Andrea Jarr, an R.A. in West, but we asked her to expand it for us," Lowden said.

On Tuesday evening, the program "Not Everyone's Doing It" presented the topic of abstinence from several viewpoints. Lowden said speakers included a couple who live in the residence halls and have decided not to engage in sexual intercourse until marriage, and a married couple who have not yet had sex.

"We've got the dating perspective and the marriage perspective," he said.

Wednesday evening's program, "Live Homosexual Acts," was the program that sparked the most interest, Lowden said.

"I was skeptical about this one at first, but all we're trying to do is break down the stereotypes," he said.

Shane Holt, coordinator of the program and sophomore in agricultural journalism, said the title of his program was intended to draw a crowd.

"My thought was the controversial name would get people to the program," Holt said. "When people think of homosexuals, they only tend to think of homosexual sex, and I'm trying to show everyone that homosexuals lead normal lives just like everyone else."

Tonight, SHAPE's presentation will feature guest speaker Dr. Wendy Blank, a physician from Lafene Health Center.

Lowden said that with SHAPE's popularity, there shouldn't be a problem in getting an audience.

"There's been a big demand for them lately," he said.

In addition to Blank's lecture, there will be a spoof on the popular show "Loveline."

"We're also going to do a 'Loveline'-type event where people can call in and ask sex-related questions before a live audience," he said.

The "Loveline" question-and-answer session will take place at 8:30 tonight in the Van Zile Hall basement, he said.

Decke said thus far, there has been a great response from the student body.

"The turnouts have been fantastic," she said. "We're trying to make it easy for everyone to attend something this week."

Decke said Sex Week mostly is geared toward students who are new to the campus.

"We're aiming this toward residence hall students, and many of them are freshmen," Decke said. "Freshmen are thinking they have to come to college and have sex, and we're trying to educate them about these issues that are facing them."

THURSDAY'S health question

Q: What are some of the important things to know about curing the effects of eye strain?

A: "If an individual has normal visual acuity (does not wear corrective lenses), eye strain after four hours of computer use can be helped with nonprescription reading glasses that magnify, sold at Wal-Mart-type stores," said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center. "However, if a person wears corrective lenses already, eye strain after four hours could mean that a new prescription is needed. An eye exam by an optometrist/ophthalmologist can determine what prescription is required. Be sure to inform the eye doctor what your particular eye-strain symptoms are. Taking breaks from the computer at regular intervals will also help to lessen eye strain and also can help your fingers, wrists, back and relieve headaches."

To have your sex/health question answered by a professional, e-mail the Collegian at jed6575@ksu.edu. Questions will run every Thursday.

Fast food, vending-machine items not best choices for hurried lunch

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Every day, students attend class throughout the lunch hour. Not having a break to eat, many decide either to skip lunch or tame their growling stomachs with fast food from the Union Food Court.

Nutritionists agree neither of these are the way to go.

"Skipping meals can make your metabolism sluggish," said Dianna Schalles, director of nutrition services at Lafene Health Center. "If you're not eating, your body thinks it's starving. Your body doesn't know when it will get the next meal, so it conserves energy.

"A lot of people trying to lose weight try that, but it's not the way to go," she said.

Instead of skipping lunch, nutritionists recommend healthy snacks that are prepared easily and can be stuffed in a backpack for those on the run.

Mary Higgins, Division of Cooperative Extension specialist in nutrition, said students should tide over their hunger with vegetables, fresh fruit or even dried fruits, such as raisins, prunes and pears. She said trail mix can be used as a nutritious snack food.

"Pick nutritionally rich food, like protein bars," said Patsy Anderson, certified nutritionist at Guiding Light Nutrition. "Protein bars provide a steady stream of energy, rather than a quick jolt of energy."

Many students in need of a pick-me-up often turn to candy bars as a source of revival. While they do provide a quick boost of energy, they will leave one feeling tired just as quickly. Anderson said that by consuming a candy bar, students are putting a lot of sugar into their systems at once. Blood sugar level increases, and after the body uses the sugar, one is left with a feeling of exhaustion. The result, she said, is like a roller coaster ride, up one minute and down the next.

"During down time, you get brain fog and get tired," she said. "Doing that perpetually is not good for you."

Nuts, grains and seeds all are good nutritional choices, Anderson said. These include soy nuts, almonds, wheat germ, and sunflower seeds.

"They don't have a lot of chemicals and sugars that you find in processed food," she said.

Schalles said in order to stay healthy, you need to remain stocked with healthy food.

"Keep well-stocked with foods such as plain popcorn, low-fat whole-grain crackers, unsweetened fruit juices, fresh fruits and vegetables, low-fat yogurt and whole-grain cereals," she said. "Take them along and avoid the temptations of vending machines, convenience stores and fast-food restaurants."

Anderson said to be careful about fast food because of its sodium and fat content.

"Sometimes you think you are getting something low-fat, like a chicken fillet, but it's the 9 ounces of mayonnaise that make it fattening," she said. "You need to look for the hidden factors, and consider the other ingredients."

The high amount or sodium found in the usual fast-food products is another reason to be careful of eating fast food, she said.

"High sodium is one of the main causes of hardening of the arteries. It also causes you to retain water and increases your blood pressure," Anderson said.

She said that if students do decide to cure their hunger with fast food, they should choose a salad or yogurt. She also said many restaurants post nutrition lists, which can make choosing a healthy meal an easier decision.

When it comes to drinks, Anderson said that water was the way to go.

"Drink more water and less sodas. Sodas hinder the absorption of vitamins and minerals," she said. "You don't have to stay away from them, just don't make them your main source of fluid a day."

Anderson said the concern for eating healthy on the run is stemming from a boost in health awareness.

"People are getting much more interested in the healthy aspects of the foods they eat," she said.

potential to build their leadership qualities."

More than 20 schools throughout the United States, including the University of Kansas, the University of Nebraska and the University of Texas, have been hosts to campus sessions in the past five years.

Heinrich said the institute is good for anyone because of the viewpoint participants come away with and the information they gain.

"This opportunity appeals to anyone in any leadership position," Heinrich said. "They come away with a new perspective and are able to step back and evaluate different leadership styles."

The registration cost for the institute is $125 per student.

Donahy said the total cost of the conference is about $30,000, and she said the committee has received numerous donations to cover a large portion of the cost of the conference.

However, because of the enormous cost, students still will have to pay to attend.

"Some organizations or individual colleges may sponsor a student to attend," Donahy said. "We are also trying to get some more donations to establish some scholarships to allow students to go to the institute."

At about this time, there is an unusual split in the plane's elevators: One moves up and the other down. These flaps on either side of the tail usually move up or down in unison to lower or raise the plane's nose.

Boeing has told investigators crew members must apply 50 pounds of pressure in opposite directions on the pilot's and co-pilot's control yokes to achieve this split outcome. Investigators surmise this might be evidence of a struggle between two crew members over how to respond to the steep dive.

Shortly thereafter, the jet's two engines are shut off. The plane regains some altitude, stalls and drops into the sea.

In Egypt, relatives angrily rejected any notion el-Batouty planned to commit suicide, described him as a loving father of five and denied the family had financial problems.

Family members said el-Batouty had just bought two automobile tires in the United States for his son's car and they believed the tires were on Flight 990.

Married for 27 years, el-Batouty joined EgyptAir in 1987 after training pilots at Egypt's Civil Aviation Authority and the air force.

The 59-year-old aviator had more than 5,000 flight hours in a Boeing 767 and was to have retired in March.

His 10-year-old daughter, Aya, suffers from the immune disorder lupus erythematosis and had been treated in the United States. "She was everything to him," his brother-in-law Essam Dahi said.

Dahi said el-Batouty was "a man of experience, honor and, most importantly, faith." He was Muslim, and it is strictly against his faith to commit suicide, something relatives referred to amid suggestions el-Batouty might be responsible for the crash.

The Egyptian government sent its senior aviation official to Washington, D.C., to take part in the crash investigation after Egypt balked at the idea of the inquiry being given to the FBI.

National Transportation Safety Board Chairman James Hall agreed to allow additional Egyptian experts more time to analyze the recorded words of the pilots so they might contribute more understanding to what was said.

"There are significant differences in the cultural interpretations of some expressions on the (voice) recorder," Hall said.

Today, Rear Adm. W.G. Sutton, commander of the Navy's recovery task force, will turn over responsibility for retrieving more of the plane's wreckage to a Navy salvage team, Hall said.

"The Navy's supervisor of salvage has been directed to contract for a large ship with heavy lift capability that can operate in heavy seas, and send it to the accident site as soon as possible for the retrieval of human remains and aircraft wreckage," he said

CABLE

According to Franz and Simon's proposal, the TV station would be a community-access station. The difference between public access and community access is that community access has a staff. Public access is run for the people, by the people.

"We feel Manhattan needs more effective television viewing with scheduled programming," Franz said.

The regularly scheduled programming time would be occupied by city groups or clubs. The station also would have news programs, newsmagazine programs and up to three public, educational and governmental channels that would air city meetings, public school programs and various other types of public-access-type programming.

The news station also would benefit students. Journalism students studying broadcasting would have the chance to intern there and graduate students could assist the full-time faculty adviser employed there. Students also could help produce the news shows in coordination with classes at K-State.

The Internet service would include Manhattan history and coverage of local issues.

"A good analogy is the community bulletin board," Franz and Simon said in their proposal.

The media center also would feature a low-power radio station. The format would include cultural content and talk-radio-type programs.

Franz's two previous programs, one from Salina, Kan., and one from Enid, Okla., would serve as models for the Manhattan center. The communities are about the same size as Manhattan.

Costs would be covered by a variety of sources. Franchise fees from the cable company and student fees could provide some funding.

Klimek said the timing couldn't be better for the proposal because the City Commission soon will be working with Cox Communications, which will be taking over Multimedia Cablevision.

"We've got an opportunity here to negotiate a new franchise fee with a new cable company," Klimek said.

Klimek said the negotiations will start in January. A possible location for the center is Manhattan Town Center. Franz said the management has not yet been contacted about the idea.

Kansas personalized license-plate design to change in 2000

Design group from Minnesota uses sunflowers, black letters for plates

By LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some people's license plates have standard tags such as "KZJ 109," or some other random combination, but other people go that extra step and get personalized plates.

Everyone has seen them and tried to decode the phrases.

Personalized plates allow expression for people who don't want the ordinary.

Every five years, the design of the personalized plate is changed. In January, a new design will be available to the public.

Pam Woods, deputy treasurer for Riley County, said the new design is now on display at the county treasurer's office.

"It has about 20 sunflowers in the left-hand lower corner. The lettering is in black, and the 'Kansas' at the top is in black," Woods said.

Riley County treasurer Eileen King said she was pleased with the results of the redesign.

"I like the design. I think it's pretty, and it depicts the state," King said.

Angela Goering, public information officer for the Kansas Department of Revenue, said the design process began almost a year in advance.

A design group called 3M, out of Minneapolis, Minn., was consulted and submitted three designs that featured native sunflowers. A number of groups were involved with the actual selection process.

"A Kansas Legislature senator, a representative of the governor's office helped the director of vehicles decide, with consultation from his staff. We wanted something different but that still included Kansas symbols," Goering said.

When the final design was chosen, it still had to pass another test.

"The Kansas Highway Patrol tests the plate for visibility at night by putting it on a car and seeing how it looks on the car," Goering said.

Security in the design is important. King said it is hard to forge a personalized plate because the real ones have a reflective coating.

The winning design won't be available for purchase until January or February, and even then, it won't be available for everyone.

"You can only get it when you renew your tags. The A's renew in February, so that's the first bunch of people who can get them," Woods said.

Woods said a personalized plate costs $44, which is a 75-cent increase from last year.

Personalized plates can have up to seven letters.

Goering said no two plates in the same county can have the same phrase.

King said the personalized plates are popular in Riley County, not for the design, but because people have an identity with a personalized plate. In fact, King said 1,650 people in Riley County have personalized plates.

Pratt-Fort Hays State merger decision could be delayed until next year

By DAVID MILES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A decision on the proposed merger of Fort Hays State University and Pratt Community College might not be approved until next year by the Kansas Board of Regents, one of its members said Wednesday.

Merger talks between the two institutions have been under way for two years, and both agree it's a good idea. However, the board, which oversees community colleges, must approve the merger for it to take place.

The Commission for Higher Education Coordination considered the proposal, but it postponed any action at least until its Nov. 30 meeting. The commission is part of the board and is composed of three regents.

Fred Kerr, the commission's chairman, said he doesn't know when the board will take action on the merger proposal, which he supports.

"In the timeframe of 1999, it's impossible to handle something of this magnitude — that's what I'm hearing (from other regents)," Kerr said of Pratt. "I don't want this proposal to just die on the vine."

Part of the reason for the delay is that regents are considering general guidelines for any merger by schools under their authority. Some board members think the guidelines should be in place before dealing with the Fort Hays-Pratt merger.

"Significantly delaying it — two to three years — will destroy what we've invested in."

— Ed Hammond, president Fort Hays State University

Nevertheless, Kerr said he hopes the regents still can make a decision before the end of the year so the proposal can be considered by lawmakers in January.

Any merger must be approved by the board and Legislature for it to take place.

If the merger occurs, Pratt would retain ownership of its campus and would be known as Pratt Community College of Fort Hays State University. Administration of the campus would be turned over to the university.

After the meeting, Pratt President Bill Wojciechowski said he wants the schools to merge because he's concerned Pratt might not get enough state money under the current funding formula.

He also said the two-year college wants to provide four-year programs in areas such as nursing and business, and being part of a university would permit that.

In addition, Wojciechowski said, a merger would provide tax relief to local residents, who help finance the community college through taxes.

Wojciechowski estimates the merger could cost the state up to $2.3 million. Much of that would come from shifting some of the burden of paying for the community college from local taxes to the state's general fund.

Fort Hays President Ed Hammond said waiting too long could jeopardize the merger because future boards of trustees at the two schools might not support the idea.

"Significantly delaying it — two to three years — will destroy what we've invested in," Hammond said.

Wojciechowski agreed, saying, "You can't allow this to go on forever."

Bonfire collapse kills 11 in Texas

■ 28 more injured in accident at Texas A&M; 2 dead victims remain stuck among rubble.

BY MICHAEL GRACZYK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLLEGE STATION, Texas — A towering, 40-foot pyramid of logs erected for Texas A&M's traditional football bonfire trembled and then came roaring down early Thursday, crushing at least 11 students to death and injuring 28 others.

Two people who had been seen trapped in the rubble in the afternoon were confirmed dead during the night. At least four of the injured were in critical condition.

Workers hoped to get to the bodies of the two students, one male and one female, by dawn, said Kem Bennett, an engineer working with the rescue crew.

A wave of grief settled over the campus of 43,000, some 90 miles northwest of Houston. Thousands turned out for a memorial service Thursday night, including former President Bush, whose presidential library is at Texas A&M.

"For the Texas Aggie family and the world, this has been a day of unspeakable grief and sorrow," A&M president Ray Bowen said. "We're all trying to cope with this tremendous loss of life and the pain and suffering."

Rescuers earlier in the day used sensitive sound-detection equipment to listen for moaning or tapping from the enormous pile of collapsed logs and heard scratching noises that led them to believe victims were trapped.

Top levels of the structure, which is tiered like a wedding cake, fell off to one side. Workers removing the base level Thursday afternoon were certain there were no bodies in that section, Humphreys said.

Later, school officials said they had accounted for everyone involved in building the bonfire structure.

The Kansas Board of Regents and the state universities received a projected budget report Thursday that proposed a 1-percent cut in funding.

Board members will discuss this issue in an appeals process next week with Gov. Bill Graves and the budget director.

"The budget director will then make a further recommendation, and we'll be into the legislative process starting in January," Regents Chairman William Docking said.

K-State Faculty Senate President Marion Gray said there was disappointment following the announcement.

"There is a sense of discouragement and despair they are experiencing," Gray said. "For the first time in years, there was reason to hope that maybe our situation is going to change for the better, and then the rug is pulled right out from under us."

Gray said it can be hard to understand the budget projections when the economy is growing. He also said university representatives will continue working for budget improvements.

Docking said there is concern about whether the funding component in Senate Bill 345 will be honored and whether all the money appropriated to the universities will be allocated.

Another topic that was addressed was research funding. Gray said making the university a Carnegie Research Institution is one of two priorities that the Faculty Senate has established.

Research funding was an issue that caused discussion, and Docking said the board plans to explore ways to gain more research funding.

"The board, I believe, will formulate proposals, recommendations within the next couple of months on some ideas we have," Docking said.

Another topic of discussion was the issue of the merger between Fort Hays State University and Pratt Community College.

Gray said a set method for dealing with mergers need to be established before mergers take place.

Docking said there will be a meeting Nov. 30 to discuss the issue.

The board plans to look at ways to develop principles on what post-secondary education should look like, Docking said.

After the meeting, regent members went into executive session to discuss personnel matters regarding Christine Crenshaw, a staff member who filed a complaint alleging she is paid as much as $20,000 less than a man in the same position.

Board members wouldn't comment on the issue.

sky EXPLOSION

JEFF COOPER/COLLEGIAN

Justin Harrison, a fifth grader at Lee School, looks into the night sky with a telescope Wednesday night at the Tuttle Creek River Pond Area. Harrison was one of about 15 people who went to the lake to view the Leonid meteor storm, a rare meteor shower that occurs every 33 years.

Star gazers gather to view meteor shower at Tuttle Creek

STORY BY JESSICA THOMAS AND KELLY EVENSON

If the old custom of wishing on shooting stars is true, there were thousands of wishes granted Wednesday night.

Many people of all ages went to Tuttle Creek State Park to view the Leonid meteor storm, a meteor shower that occurs every 33 years.

Dean Stramel, earth science teacher at Manhattan High School, was at Tuttle Creek with two of the school's telescopes to aid in the viewing of the shower.

He said he invited students from the area elementary, middle and high schools to come and view the stars while also watching for the meteor shower.

"The shower can appear anywhere in the sky," Stramel said "It just depends where they enter the earth's atmosphere."

Stramel said the most likely place the meteors would be seen is out of the east. More precisely, they would appear to be coming out of the constellation Leo.

He said that although it was a perfect night to view the shower, there was more moonlight than he would have liked.

"The fainter, smaller stars are more difficult to see because the moonlight lights up the sky far more than people realize," Stramel said. "The later we go into the night, the easier meteors and stars will be able to see, because there will be less moonlight."

Gabrielle Thompson, Manhattan resident, said she and her son Nate, a sixth grader at Lee School, came out to watch the shower after a note was sent home from his teacher explaining what Stramel was doing at Tuttle Creek.

"We came to see if we could see any falling stars," Thompson said. "We are all star watchers, and a couple of times of year we will go camping to watch the sky. Nate loves to do this type of thing."

Justin Harrison, fifth grader at Lee, said he likes looking at the stars to find constellations and being able to look at the moon, stars and planets through telescopes.

"I like looking at the sky and finding different constellations," Harrison said. "It is cool because of the different pictures they make."

Stramel said he organizes several star-gazing trips to Tuttle Creek each year.

Although watching the stars has been an interest for him since he was young, he said many of his students in his science classes do not get the same enjoyment.

"Some do like astronomy, but they don't make a big deal about it because they might seem like a nerd," Stramel said. "I have always liked it because the sky is always there. It was the same sky that George Washington looked at when he crossed Valley Forge, and the same one Christopher Columbus saw when he was sailing.

"There are so many neat things out there, and 200 years from now when people are riding a space shuttle to Jupiter, it will be the same sky we are looking at now."

Stramel said it is hard to predict how much viewers would get to see because of when and where the meteors enter the atmosphere and the time of night they are looking. He said the best time to see the meteors is after midnight and toward sunrise, because that is when Leo is best seen.

"I told them that it could be a dud, but it might also be the most amazing thing you've ever seen," he said.

Comet Tempel-Tuttle has a 33-year-long orbit. On Nov. 17, 1966, meteors filled the sky for almost an hour.

The meteors, known as falling or shooting stars, are space debris that make up the tail of a comet.

They range in size from grains of sand to pebbles and travel from 7 to 46 miles per hour. When they hit the Earth's atmosphere, they are vaporized by air friction in a white-hot streak.

Most meteors are seen 50 to 75 miles above the ground, though they might appear to be much closer.

Leonids' Light Delights

■ The annual Leonid meteor shower reached its height of intensity Wednesday night. Astronomers estimated seeing more than 2,000 meteors during one 40-minute period.

■ Up to 20,000 shooting stars per hour were predicted during the meteor shower, which occured when dust and ice shed by the comet Tempel-Tuttle streaked into the Earth's atmosphere at 40 miles per second and burned up.

■ The fireballs darted everywhere overhead, but all appeared to come from the direction of the constellation Leo, which gives the shower its name.

Top tailgater to rate K-State at final game

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State football fans fill the parking lot at KSU Stadium on a weekly basis, surrounded by the smell of hamburgers, hot dogs and barbecue.

It has become a tradition synonymous with the fall, and this weekend it gets another twist.

Joe Cahn, commissioner of tailgating, will experience it all when K-State plays Missouri.

Cahn will be making his first trip to Manhattan.

"Tailgating is all about meeting old friends and new people in the parking lot every week," Cahn said. "Tailgating is all about being the last great American neighborhood."

Kent Brown, director of K-State sports information, said K-State fans do an excellent job of supporting the team both in and out of the stadium.

"I am pretty proud of our atmosphere," Brown said. "I would put it up against any in the country."

Cahn has spent the past four years traveling around the country experiencing tailgating. He plans to go to Europe next spring to check out tailgating in Europe, and he also is planning a trip for next year to see if tailgating is Y2K compliant.

At the end of each year, Cahn gives an award to the school and NFL team with the best tailgating.

Cahn said his favorite spots to visit are Green Bay, Wisc., and Kansas City, Mo. He will visit Arrowhead Stadium on Sunday when the Kansas City Chiefs play the Seattle Seahawks.

2 dead in Iowa train wreck; injuries in California crash

A freight train struck an empty grain train late Wednesday in northwest Iowa, killing a conductor and the driver of a van that was parked by the tracks. A second train accident injured at least 15 in California on Thursday.

Northeast of Sioux City, five locomotives and 30 cars derailed between the two trains in the collision, said Mark Davis, a Union Pacific spokesman based in Omaha, Neb., on Thursday. Both trains were Union Pacific trains.

The conductor of the freight train, Paul Schmidt, 23, was killed. The name of the van driver, who was on the scene to shuttle crew members from the stopped train, was not released.

The grain train was parked on the main tracks when the southbound freight train hit it at the junction with a side track. A fire broke out, but it was extinguished.

"We're investigating why the freight train didn't go on to the side track," Davis said. He did not know if the tracks are switched automatically or by hand.

In Fullerton, Calif., a MetroLink commuter train with about 65 passengers struck a freight train Thursday, injuring at least 15 people.

The Burlington Northern Santa Fe freight train and MetroLink train sideswiped each other, resulting in some fire, MetroLink spokesman Peter Hidalgo said.

Local sheriff tries to remove prosecutor from ouster case

TOPEKA — Shawnee County Sheriff Dave Meneley is trying to get the attorney general's office removed from prosecuting his civil ouster proceedings.

Meneley faces 13 counts of willful misconduct or violations of moral turpitude, which Attorney General Carla Stovall says justifies removing him from office. No date has been set for the ouster trial.

Tuesday, Meneley asked a judge to block Stovall from prosecuting the ouster case, saying Topeka attorney James Welch, a witness in the case, is now an assistant attorney general.

Meneley said any conversations he might have had in 1995 with Welch were confidential and can't be used against him.

In May, Stovall moved to oust Meneley from office after his April arrest on two charges of perjury. The sheriff says he's innocent and has done nothing to warrant his removal from office.

Homeless in Denver on alert after discovery of 2 bodies

DENVER — The decapitated bodies of two apparently homeless men have been found less than a week after arrests were made in five recent beating deaths of transients.

The bodies were found Wednesday after a homeless person spotted one of the corpses in a weed-covered field behind Union Station, Denver's main railroad station.

The unidentified men were believed to be homeless. Both were decapitated, Mayor Wellington Webb said.

Webb said he thought the killings would stop after several youths were arrested for the death of a transient.

"We were really taken aback when the other two bodies were found," Webb said.

He said some investigators theorize the killings resulted from a turf war between a group of "mall rats" — homeless young people along the downtown 16th Street Pedestrian Mall — and older transients who have been the targets.

Webb asked U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno to provide FBI resources for the investigation.

State school superintendent charged in ticket-fee scam

LINCOLN, Neb. — A Kansas school superintendent accused of letting people into Nebraska home football games for his own fee now faces charges for doing so, Lancaster County authorities say.

Roger "Doc" Baskerville, a ticket taker at Memorial Stadium from Washington, Kan., was charged Tuesday with theft of services and aiding and abetting in first-degree criminal trespassing, Deputy County Attorney Steve Schmidt said.

If convicted, Baskerville, 53, could face 18 months in jail, a $1,500 fine or both. He is scheduled to appear in court Tuesday.

Baskerville was arrested Nov. 6 at the Nebraska home football game against Texas A&M. He admitted he let 16 people who did not have tickets into the game after a man gave him $100, University of Nebraska police said.

Baskerville is superintendent of Washington-Greenleaf School District near the Nebraska-Kansas border. The district has 400 students from kindergarten through 12th grade.

He has been superintendent for 18 years. His annual salary is more than $70,000, including benefits, school board member Chris Pannbacker said.

The board has scheduled a special meeting Nov. 29 to discuss non-elected personnel, Pannbacker said.

Kosovo investigation halts after exhuming 508 bodies

LONDON — British war crimes investigators said Thursday they have suspended work in Kosovo for the winter after uncovering 508 bodies, most of them elderly ethnic Albanian men who had been shot in the head.

British investigators are among 14 forensic teams that have exhumed bodies at 195 sites in Kosovo since the end of the 78-day NATO bombing campaign in June.

In one exhumation in Velika Krusa, the British team found about 40 men who had been shot in a barn and burned under a pile of hay.

The exact death toll will never be known, said John Bunn, head of Scotland Yard's forensic team, who recently returned from Kosovo.

"It's just a mess. It's unidentifiable," Bunn said. "All you can do is try to retrieve bones and match the bones up."

Evidence is to be turned over to the U.N. war crimes tribunal for the former Yugoslavia.

The United Nations said teams has exhumed 2,108 bodies so far. Intelligence reports and witnesses indicate they should have found 4,266 bodies.

Pepsi deal to include Salina site

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State-Salina will be included in the new contract between K-State and PepsiCo Inc.

"The distributor in Salina has agreed to be a part of it," said Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president of administration and finance.

Schellhardt said the campus already has a contract with Pepsi, but it will be included in the new contract that runs through 2010.

He said it is a significantly smaller campus than Manhattan, with 923 students, and Schellhardt said they have about 20 fully stocked Pepsi machines on campus.

Schellhardt said final contract negotiations are taking place, and a contract should be rendered quickly.

"The contract starts in January, so we'd better hurry," Schellhardt said. "But I don't foresee any problems though."

People at K-State-Salina said the existing contract with Pepsi has had minimal effect.

K-State-Salina Student Body President Jon Watkins said the campus has a good relationship with Pepsi.

"Really, it was a good deal for us," Watkins said. "They were already on our campus, and we had a pretty good relationship."

He said Pepsi works hard to help promote the university's different events.

"They create banners, etcetera when there is a big event going on like prereg-istration, and stuff like the Career Fair," Watkins said. "They help us out pretty well."

Watkins said the lack of options has not created a controversy on campus, especially since there are opportunities to buy Coca-Cola products at the school's bookstore.

"It's something just like anywhere else," Watkins said. "Our bookstore is owned privately, so there are some options for Coke products, but for the most part, I haven't heard any negative things come out of that."

Laughter in the Union

Lee School students learn Four Fish Philosophy during book-week festivities

BY LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Giggling and singing filled the Union Courtyard on Thursday as students from Lee School took part in Children's Book Week festivities.

Chuck McMichael, co-creator of the children's video series "Four Fish Fly Free," was invited by the K-State Union Bookstore to view showings of the videos, which are meant for children ages 4 to 10.

"However, we found that it appeals to children much younger and much older," McMichael said.

John Strawn, marketing director for the Four Fish Productions production company, said the videos teach fundamentals of music along with life lessons.

There are four videos, each of which were shot on campus at Dole Hall. The marketing department is also in Manhattan, but McMichael and his production team are based out of Little River, Kan.

McMichael said Children's Book Week has been going well. He said they do two to three shows per day, and the children from various elementary schools in town have enjoyed them as a kind of field trip. The children also were given tours of the temporary book store.

Thursday's video was "Red's Musical Misadventure," in which Red the fish learns not to be afraid to sing or to try new things.

"It was very good and very funny," Kristen Ruga, 9, said. Her friends, Anna Tatarko, 9, and Natalie Harris, 8, said they especially like the rat.

After the children watched the video, McMichael introduced Mr. O, the octopus custodian.

McMichael then spoke to the children about how they could buy the videos, which are available in English and Spanish. They can be purchased only at one place, the Union Bookstore.

Children also can join the "Fin Club" if they enjoyed the videos.

"Of course, when you're dealing with fish, you don't have a fan club, you have a fin club," McMichael said.

The club was popular with some of the children attending.

"I am going to join the Fin Club," Cammi Morgan, 8, said.

McMichael said the purpose for the videos can be explained by the Four Fish Philosophy:

— Encourage: to help foster children's growth while experiencing life's lessons.

— Educate: to give children knowledge of what music is and can be.

— Entertain: to keep children's attention in a manner that makes learning fun.

— Empower: to inspire children to envision all they can do or become.

In coordination with the showings of Four Fish Productions' videos, the Union Bookstore is offering 25 percent off all children's books and videos, 20 percent off all Crayola products and 15 percent off all Colorific products.

Chance to vote to save McCulloh approaches

It's as if Manhattan has become Salem, Mass., during the witch trials.

And Commissioner Karen McCulloh could be burned in effigy at the stake if students and Manhattan community members don't register to vote for McCulloh's retaining her City Commission seat in voting that lasts until Dec. 7. Your opportunity to get registered ends even earlier — Monday.

McCulloh is the Manhattan city commissioner who might lose her position because she voted to remove the Ten Commandments monolith from city property. If she loses her office, it will be a miscarriage of democracy.

Elected officials should be allowed to vote their conscience. If that means upsetting those who elected them, so be it. The general election — not a recall election — is the proper place for voters to express disappointment in the way an elected official votes.

The recall election also could create a chilling effect for future Manhattan city commissioners and elected officials. Elected officials will face opposition. If they face a recall every time that happens, they might be too afraid to vote. Plus, there will be a constant revolving door of elected officials, not to mention the monetary cost of running dozens of elections every year.

Recall elections should be used only for extreme abuses of power. Casting a vote usually isn't an abuse of power. The votes cast between now and Dec. 7 might be an abuse of power, however, if McCulloh is removed from office for performing her duty.

Learning to Give Thanks

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

Family, faith, freedom among reasons to express gratitude this Thanksgiving

It is amazing how much we take for granted.

At the first Thanksgiving, men and women who had much less than we do gave thanks — not because it was a national holiday, but merely because they had overcome the winter, disease and the stubborn New England soil. They were grateful for God's blessing and for the generous help they received from nearby American Indians. As this Thanksgiving approaches, it seems only fitting to take an accurate inventory of just what all we have to be thankful for.

Probably one of the things we take for granted the most is our freedom. In many countries, if I were writing the things I have been writing in the Collegian this semester, I would be arrested, tortured and killed. Every year, about 100,000 people are put to death worldwide simply for loving Jesus.

So often we like to look at what others have that we do not have and complain about how deprived we are. But almost all of us here at K-State are already within the top 15 percent economically compared with the rest of the world. The poorest people in America live better than kings and queens did only 200 years ago. Americans on the welfare rolls live better than the majority of the world's population.

So often we survey all that we have and conclude that it was solely by our own hard work and ability that we have achieved it. But do I really work harder than people who are doing back-breaking labor in Mexico or Bangladesh for 12 hours a day in return for pennies? No. But I have been blessed to live in a nation where hard work actually yields rewards, where there are opportunities for education and advancement.

Of course, if I did not take advantage of those opportunities, I would not have accomplished what I have so far in life. But compared with people worldwide, the real difference is not what I have earned or done, but what I have been given.

My family has not been threatened because of their faith. I attended a more or less well-funded high school and received an education that many around the world could only dream of. I am now doing what I have looked forward to for years — going to K-State, living on my own (for the most part), studying what interests me, pursuing my dreams. I have never gone hungry. I have never had to worry about how our family will make ends meet. What I have, people around the world literally are dying for. These are blessings given to me that I did not earn or deserve. But somehow, having grown up in free and prosperous America, we start to think that we deserve these things. In a sense, that is true — all people deserve freedom and the opportunity to make a better life for themselves. But there is no reason, apart from the grace and goodness of God, that we have these things when so many don't. My former girlfriend, Sarah, used to ask with tears of compassion in her eyes: "Why was I given all this when so many around the world are starving, persecuted and oppressed? Why was I born in America and not in some starving country in Africa? Why am I so blessed when others have so little?" I really had no answer at that the time. But now, all I can say is what King Arthur, played by Sean Connery, says in the movie "First Knight:" "God makes us strong only for a little while so that we can help each other."

I'm not trying to lay a guilt trip on anyone. But is it possible that maybe we have some responsibility to use all that we have been given, to at least a small extent, to help those who are in need? It is so easy for me to begin complaining about what I don't have and the things in my life that aren't working out the way I want them to. But sure enough, God always seems to bring me back to reality, sometimes gently and sometimes by just about whacking me upside the head, but always lovingly.

I am confronted with the sheer ugliness of my attitude. I am sickened by my ungratefulness. And I am overwhelmed by the magnitude of all that I have been given — a close, loving family, a wonderful little sister and an awesome brother, good friends here at K-State and a great roommate. I have my needs provided for, all the natural abilities that God has given me, the freedom to believe and worship as I please, to speak freely, to not live under threat of unjust imprisonment or torture. I don't have to fight in a war. I have had opportunities available to me that others can only dream of. I am healthy, with ready access to medical care. I even have "little" things like sanitation, clean air and water, air conditioning, transportation and shoes. I could go on and on about all of the blessings with which we have been showered.

Most of all, I have come to the realization that although most of these things are free to us, they are by no means without cost. I have plenty because my parents have worked hard to provide for me and live in a land where their hard work is rewarded. Our freedoms were purchased with the blood of young men not much older than myself, who went to countries they had never heard of and died for the cause of liberty.

In the same way, I think of what Jesus Christ did for me on the cross. Though I did not deserve it, and I had neither honored him as Lord nor loved him, he gave his life so that I could be free. Because of his sacrifice, I am forgiven from sin and free from fear, from guilt and from condemnation. I in no way deserve to be free from these things — in fact, I deserve to be their slave. But I have been given freedom that was purchased with the very life of God's one and only son. So this Thanksgiving, let us — at least for a few days — reflect on how much we all have to be grateful for. Let us think of those less fortunate, who lack the opportunities and freedoms we have, and what our responsibility might be to them. Despite everything that is wrong in our nation, God has blessed America, our home sweet home. Gratefulness is the only appropriate response.

Remaining subtle, avoiding fatal attractions keys to successful stalking

My mom wants to know what I want for Christmas. I tried to remind her that Dec. 25 is a month and a half away, but she's already starting to sound frantic.

Last year, Santa filled my stocking with some toothpaste, deodorant and a book on why smart women make stupid decisions about men. I'm not sure what my parents were trying to tell me, but I think it would be to my advantage to let my mom in on some gift ideas. Perhaps I can avoid receiving personal hygiene products and self-help books.

I'd like some new clothes, some computer software and maybe some infrared night-vision binoculars.

For stalking, of course.

Now, I don't consider myself psycho or obsessive, but I think most women have a natural curiosity about their ex-boyfriends. For instance, what are they up to now? Are they happy with the blonde Hooters waitress they left you for?

These questions deserved to be answered.

The key to successful stalking — although I prefer the term "strategically anonymous ex-boyfriend house calls" — is to be subtle. One of my exes once told me that he saw my car go by his house eight times in half an hour. That would be an example of what not to do.

I'm talking about some casual drive-bys with a borrowed flower delivery van with tinted windows and maybe a hang-up phone call or two. It's childish, I know, but I'm convinced it's therapeutic.

Now, some of my exes are out of range for these harmless and enjoyable activities. One is playing professional athletics, and another is doing graduate work at Oxford University. I simply don't have the resources or the security clearance to effectively handle those two. Plus, these incognito exercises are only fun if you really care what your ex is up to. Once you've managed to effectively expunge any romantic feelings for him, it's time to move on.

Of course, not that all my former paramours are all-stars. One of my exes, always the underachiever, got arrested for armed robbery and is serving time in the state pen.

Another ground rule is one must respect the fine line between sport-stalking and stalking-with-the-intent-to-maim. Take Natalie, for example. She's a nice girl, seems to be reasonably rational. She went through a bad breakup and turned into Glenn Close, a la Fatal Attraction. Luckily, we were able to stage an intervention before she ended up boiling her ex's rabbit over the stove top.

So if you happen to spot me and the girls running through the neighborhood in army fatigues or perching atop a low-hanging branch outside a well-lit window, we're on a mission.

Contradiction of Fourum, column confuses readers

Editor,

If the intention of Thursday's Opinion page was to create confusion about an important local political issue, you probably succeeded.

After months of debate and division, the recall election of Manhattan City Commissioner Karen McCulloh is at hand. Advance voting began Wednesday at the Riley County Clerk's office.

After signing in, voters are handed a ballot — on which is printed exactly one question: "Shall Karen McCulloh be recalled from the office of Manhattan city commissioner?" Voters have a choice between selecting "Yes" or "No."

Please read that carefully. Those who wish Karen McCulloh to retain her office should vote "no"; those that wish her to be removed from office should vote "yes."

Columnist Travis D. Lenkner seems to have things straight, but it's not entirely clear at the end of his column. He seems to be suggesting that McCulloh not be ousted unjustly from her position, and that those that agree with him should vote "no." This is correct.

Then, just a few inches to the left, in the Campus Fourum, the first caller said: "I would like to suggest that all KSU students register to vote on Dec. 7, and vote yes to keep Karen McCulloh in office." This is a factual error and had no business being printed. If you plan to cover the news, please take the time to get your facts straight. This issue has been leading the local media long enough for you to do so.

I respectfully request a clarification printed on the Opinion page of an upcoming issue — the sooner, the better.

Thank you for your attention to this matter.

Blood should be examined carefully with lives on line

Editor,

This is concerning the article and editorial on Nov. 17 about the Red Cross' "discrimination" in its screening process. Having a safe blood supply is important. One of the many arguments against stereotyping AIDS victims is that many AIDS victims have gotten that way by tainted blood. I would think those who are in some manner or form unable to provide blood would be happier not to be spreading their infections or diseases.

Besides, there are alternatives to donating blood, like donating plasma. Many of the conditions that prevent the donation of blood do not affect donating plasma. Removing those likely to provide tainted blood through a screening process reduces the possibility that something horrible could happen. Trusting in the marvels of technology to do the screening is foolish.

I had a brush with the "trust in the marvels of technology" screening method. My daughter and I experienced panic in the early '80s when we received what was thought to be AIDS-tainted blood. Back then, tainted blood was donated and used, because the screening process for AIDS-tainted blood didn't exist. I cannot begin to describe the anxiety and suffering my family and I went through when we were notified that my daughter and I might have received tainted blood — not to mention the annual blood tests for years thereafter —and what it was like to know in my second operation in '95 that the blood I was going to get could not be guaranteed clean. Even when my wife had to get blood in '97 as a result of her bleeding ulcers, I had to fight the nightmares of earlier years.

I'm sorry if it hurts anybody's feelings when I say this, but when it comes to the possibility that a member of my family or I could get the deadly disease someone else might have, I don't care about that person's precious feelings. I would want to know that the blood donor was screened, and everything possible done to protect us.

If it was your life on the line, I'm sure you would, too.

Editor,

Your cover story Nov. 12 reported the tragic death of Becky Sester, a 15-year-old Wamego High School student whose car was hit by a train. You also printed a picture of the car after the collision.

There are hundreds of young people mourning at WHS, not to mention Becky's family, teachers and the community. These mourners, myself included, would rather not have seen a photo of Becky's mangled car in your paper, especially the day after her death.

I do not want to accuse you of callousness, and I am quite aware of your freedoms of speech and of the press. If this tragedy had occurred in some distant place and not in a local community, then maybe the photo would have been more appropriate. Just look at the faces of the young people you pictured grieving — that picture would have been enough. It said it all.

Program targets city conflict

■ Community members get advice on handling issues in Manhattan.

BY COURTNEY DUFFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Sticks and Stones Might Break a Town, But Words Can Help Unite Us" was the topic of a program that offered Manhattan citizens solutions to their community conflicts.

The program was conducted at the Manhattan Public Library on Thursday night by David Procter, associate professor and head of the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance. The program was sponsored by UFM Community Learning Center, the Riley County Extension Office, Pawnee Mental Health Services and the Manhattan Konza Rotary Club.

Procter said effective communication helps resolve conflict, but it is only one part of the solution.

"Some people believe that if you just talk it out, you can resolve conflicts. What I am saying is that communication is not the silver bullet," Procter said. "It is not the magic pill. There are lots of components of this conflict. Effective communication itself can help, but it is not everything."

Procter used as an example the recent debate over the removal of the Ten Commandments monolith and the recall vote of Karen McCulloh to prove his research about effective communication.

There are three basic sides to this argument, Procter said. The first side he calls "Anti-move and pro-recall." This group was against moving the monolith and now is supporting the recall vote. He calls the second group "Pro-move and anti-recall."

This group supports moving the monolith and is against the recall vote. The third group he calls "Above all we must remain a civil community." This group believes that even though the community disagrees, it must resolve the conflict in a responsible manner.

Some Manhattan residents said the majority did not get represented. Others said minority opinions also have the right to be protected.

"I do not think she should be removed," said Nikki Martin, junior in geography, referring to McCulloh. "She made a good call. Honestly, it is a legal issue separating church and state, and if I had to vote, I'd vote to keep her there."

Others commend the way commissioners handled the issue.

"I think the City Commission is doing the best job they can given their rules for governing. I think that it is a difficult job, and I commend the way they dealt with it," said Terrie McCants, campus Peace Corps representative.

Procter studied news stories, the City Commission meeting where they voted to remove the monolith, and editorials and columns written for and against the decision.

Procter said there are two types of arguments: one personally based and the other based on issues.

"In terms of short-term political change, it's the personal debates we are seeing here, but in the long term, healthy government needs more issue-oriented talk," Procter said.

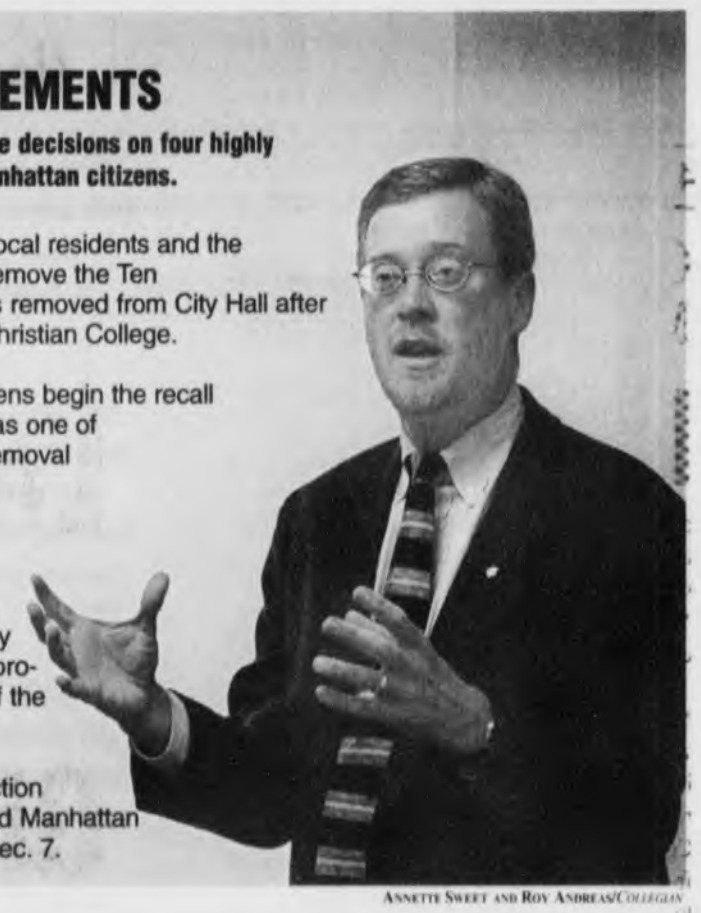
He said conflict occurred because people felt their opinions were not taken seriously. He said people felt the commissioners came to the meeting with their minds made up.

Procter said a community forum in which people could get together and talk about the issues would help resolve the problem. The forums need to be places where people can discuss their opinions openly and people are held accountable for what they say because they meet often, Procter said.

McCants said she agreed.

"I think from the comments I heard tonight that there is a need to establish a forum where people can be heard, and there is a need for fair play," she said.

RECENT DISAGREEMENTS



In the past year, City Commission has made decisions on four highly recognized issues concerning Manhattan citizens.

■ April 1999, Ten Commandments: Seven local residents and the American Civil Liberties Union file a suit to remove the Ten Commandments monolith. The monolith was removed from City Hall after a 3-2 vote. It now will reside at Manhattan Christian College.

■ June 1999, recall petition: A group of citizens begin the recall process for Karen McCulloh because she was one of three commission members who voted for removal of the monolith. The Election Office requires 2,237 votes in a 90-day period.

■ August 1999, Wal-Mart Superstore proposal: The development of a new Wal-Mart raised concerns for Manhattan residents. City commission voted unanimously against the project and said it was not in the best interest of the city at that particular time.

■ September 1999, recall election: The Election Office received 2,896 signatures of registered Manhattan voters. McCulloh's recall election is set for Dec. 7.

Student Senate grants Lafene $55,000 emergency allocation; Fine Arts Council bills introduced

BY LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An emergency allocation of $55,426.83 to Lafene Health Center was passed by Student Senate 50-0 at their meeting Thursday night.

The money will be used for upgrading Lafene's computers to be Y2K compliant.

Privilege Fee Chair Ryan Walker said the bill had taken a long time to prepare because a program the health center wanted hadn't been written yet.

There were other amendments to the original bill as well.

"We had their computer people come and talk to us. We found out they already had $10,000 in their budget for computers so we deducted that out of our allocation," Walker said.

Two other groups, the American Ethnic Studies Student Association and the Muslim Student Association, received allocations.

The American Ethnic Student Association will receive $1,035 for a lecture on diversity in the workplace. The Muslim Student Association will receive $1,700 for two guest speakers.

Two bills regarding the Fine Arts Council were introduced. The first will change the funding guidelines of the council. Instead of unspent funds being sent back to the council, the money would revert to the campus privilege fee adjustment account.

The second bill changes the number of faculty members on the council from eight to nine. The extra member would represent the Ebony Theatre.

"Ebony Theatre was included with the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance, but because there is a separate budget for Ebony Theatre, we thought they should have their own representative," said Ted Conrad, business senator and Fine Arts Council chairman.

Operations Chair Dustin Petrik said he was pleased with the way the Fine Arts Council was conducting their business.

"I attended a Fine Arts Council meeting and looked at their allocations process. It seemed balanced and professional. I'm ready to give them the benefit of the doubt and pass their by-laws amendment and move on to other business," Petrik said.

Final action on that bill will take place Dec. 2.

Something to PROVE

Season opener against Drake to challenge women's basketball team

STORY BY SARAH CRAIG

K-State's women's basketball team opens the regular season at 7 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum against Drake, the Missouri Valley Conference preseason favorite.

Head coach Deb Patterson said the game is crucial to the progress of the team and provides a challenging season opener.

"At this point I look at this as a critical game," Patterson said. "I think we need to get out of the blocks and establish who we're going to be, we need to prove that we've taken steps from where we were a year ago, because right around the corner is NC State and Alabama, and this is a great opener because it will test us to the max. We need this with our non-conference schedule."

The Cats lost at Drake last season, 88-67. Patterson said Drake is a strong opponent in that the Bulldogs are strong all around and know how to take advantage of other teams' weaknesses.

"This is a team that really took it to us last year," Patterson said. "They are a very balanced team that plays a very intelligent basketball game. They set a lot of screens, pick and roll, run the ball on the transition game and have the ability to shoot the transition three."

The Cats plan to counter that with solid play on the perimeter, an area of weakness in last Sunday's game. Point guard April Sailors said she will have to improve her judgment on the court against Drake.

"I'm going to take care of the ball a lot better," Sailors said. "I'm not going to rush into things. I have to be under control and have a lot more confidence with the ball. I'm just going to compete my hardest."

The Bulldogs boast a 6-foot-5-inch center in senior Tammi Blackstone, who ranked eighth nationally last year in blocks and led Drake in scoring, averaging 17.6 points a game, and rebounding (7.2).

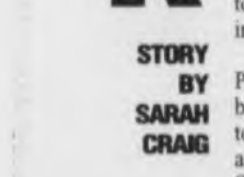
K-State looks to its three-player post rotation of seniors Angie Finkes, Nicky Ramage and Olga Firsova to answer Drake's inside game.

"Offensively, I'm just going to try to make some moves that we've been learning, just try to use what I know and if there's going to be a double- or triple-team on me just try to move the ball around to our other shooters, and they'll have to respect that aspect, too," Firsova said.

Finkes' reply to the defense necessary to shut down the inside game was simple.

"Try to block the shots," she said.

The Cats will look to maximize their home-court advantage, having lost at Drake last year. Finkes said playing at home provides an edge that she doesn't find when traveling.



"Bramlage is a great place to play," Finkes said. "I think anywhere you go, home-court advantage is a big factor in the game. It'll be nice playing them here, definitely."

Sailors said a quality collective team effort should produce a victory.

"A win is very important. I think if we come out and play really hard and give 100 percent, every single one of us, nobody letting up, we should win," Sailors said.

Former Cornhusker running back proves 2nd, 3rd chances waste of time

VIEWPOINT

MIKE VIETTI

"Only in the world of sports."

In the time it takes to heat up a slice of pizza in the microwave, another 10,000 people have uttered that phrase.

It's catching on so well, it looks as if it's going to replace Marv Albert's snazzy variation of "Bite me," which is the even snazzier "I bite you."

The most recent athlete to force all those thousands to shake their fists in the air in a fit of rage is another former Nebraska Cornhusker.

I'm not trying to pick on them — really, I promise, but there is just some special quality that merits scrutiny amongst the likes of Christian Peter, DeAngelo Evans and now Lawrence Phillips — oh wait, he was already in the group.

Nevertheless, the ongoing saga of Phillips' life, titled "Me, Myself and I" for the upcoming TV special, received a few more pages to the already overwhelming script about a selfish, lazy and annoyingly gifted athlete who has failed on the football field because of his own actions.

Earlier this week, the San Francisco 49ers, Phillips' third team in four years in the NFL, suspended the troubled running back after he reportedly refused to practice and burst out laughing when head coach Steve Mariucci began to scold the team during practice.

Go figure.

Apparently, Phillips was displeased over his role with the team. He signed with the 49ers as a free agent before the season after rushing for more than 1,000 yards in the NFL Europe last year. He probably assumed he would be the starter over fellow free agent Charlie Garner because, after all, we're talking about the incredibly gifted Lawrence Phillips.

Coming off of that impressive stint in the NFL minor league where he ran past defenders who, for the most part, aren't good enough to make the roster of any NFL team, he probably thought the job should have been entirely his.

But it wasn't. Garner outperformed him, so what did Phillips do? He found the always-available route of quitting, which he basically steam-rolled onto. Upon his refusal to practice, Phillips reportedly said, "Why practice, you're not going to put me in anyway?"

Can we call that the "DeAngelo Evans syndrome?" Or should it be named for Phillips? I guess it's a toss-up.

The 49ers should have known what they were getting into. While at Nebraska, Phillips served probation for beating a former girlfriend.

In Phillips' 19-month tenure with the St. Louis Rams, he was arrested three times and spent 23 days in jail.

After his failure with the Rams, the Miami Dolphins picked him up, only to release him soon thereafter when Phillips was charged with hitting a woman in a nightclub.

This is where the phrase comes into play. "Only in the world of sports" would a person of Phillips' ineptitude be given chance after chance after chance to prove he's capable of being a decent human being.

Memo to Phillips: You're not even close.

The saddest part of the whole ordeal is that once the 49ers cut Phillips, he'll be picked up by yet another team that will overlook his lack of character in the hope that he'll finally develop into a solid football player.

Think of the message that sends to all of the impressionable 10-year-olds in the country who devoutly follow not just football, but all other sports as well.

"Boys and girls, it's OK to be a jackass for your entire life, just as long as you've got great athletic ability. Don't worry about finding a job, there will always be a sucker around each and every corner that will take a wasted chance on you."

Don't get me wrong here, I'm a believer in giving people second and third chances — I've been in need of those before. But there comes a point in time when a second or third chance should stop before it actually becomes the 20th chance, a destination for which Phillips is, no doubt, headed.

So to all the NFL teams out there peering at the NFL waiver wire in search of a good running back, take the advice of the 49ers, Dolphins, Rams and myself (for what it's worth): Skip the waste of space named Lawrence Phillips.

He should be out of chances.

K-State falls to Aggie team

■ Texas A&M keeps streak alive; Wildcats prepare to face Kansas.

BY IVAN KOZAR
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Texas A&M's volleyball team, ranked 14th nationally, defeated 18th-ranked K-State in four games Wednesday night in College Station, Texas, running its home winning streak to 16.

After leading 13-12 in game one, the Wildcats (18-7, 12-5) could not put away the Aggies (22-5, 13-4), who came back to take the game, 15-13.

In game two, the Cats jumped to a quick 12-1 lead and took that game, 15-7.

After the break, it was all Aggies.

Texas A&M took game three in a 15-9 decision and went on to win the match in a lopsided game four, 15-5.

The Cats were led by senior outside hitter Dawn Cady's 15 digs and match-high 23 kills.

Also contributing was sophomore outside hitter Liz Wegner with 19 kills and 13 digs.

The loss dropped the Cats to third place in the Big 12 Conference behind Texas and A&M, who are tied for second, and league-leading Nebraska.

The Wildcats' next test will come at intrastate rival Kansas (17-10, 8-8) at 5 p.m. Saturday in the Horejsi Family Athletics Center.

The Jayhawks are led by junior outside hitter Amy Myatt, who averages 3.98 kills a game and has recorded 853 total attacks on the year. Myatt led the Jayhawks with 18 kills against the Cats earlier in the season.

In the first meeting of the season, the Wildcats defeated the Jayhawks in four games in front of 5,011 at Ahearn Field House.

K-State sophomore setter Disney Bronnenberg totaled 53 assists for the match, and sophomore outside hitter Jayne Christen posted a .333 attack percentage.

Basketball team to battle Demons

BY SAM STIERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's men's basketball team will try for its first victory of the season Sunday at 1 p.m. when it plays host to the Northwestern State Demons at Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State is coming off an 88-69 loss at ninth-ranked Arizona. The Cats, who committed 24 turnovers and shot a dismal 29 percent in the first half, will look to improve on their poor performance.

The Cats should fare better against Northwestern State of Nachitoches, La. The Demons are a Division I-AA school that finished 11-14 last season.

In the Arizona game, one K-State highlight was the play of senior forward Tony Kitt, who scored 11 points, hitting three of five shots. Guards Galen Morrison and Cortez Groves each scored 13 points and hit all their free-throw attempts.

The Cats' front court, featuring the 6-foot-8-inch Kitt and 7-foot Joe Leonard, should lead the way Sunday against the Demons, whose tallest player is 6-7.

Northwestern State is coached by Mike McConathy, who is in his first year at the school. McConathy came to Northwestern State from Bossier Parish Community College in Bossier City, La., where he was considered one of the nation's best community college coaches and where his team finished in the top 25 the past three seasons.

The Demons, who will play their first game of the season tonight at Wyoming, won their only exhibition game.

Chalupa mix-up leads to arrest of KU player

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE — A 270-pound University of Kansas football player got stuck in the drive-thru window of a Taco Bell when he tried to charge employees who left the chalupa out of his order, authorities said.

Dion Rayford, a 6-foot-3-inch senior defensive end, was suspended for the game Saturday against Iowa State, the last game of his college career. He was released on his own recognizance after appearing in court Wednesday on charges of disorderly conduct, having an open container of alcohol and misdemeanor damage to property.

An innocent plea was entered for Rayford, who had started all 11 games this season.

Rayford, 24, allegedly became angry about 2 a.m. Wednesday when he didn't get the chalupa. He tried to climb through the 14-by-46-inch drive-thru window, said Lawrence police Sgt. George Wheeler.

The night manager, Tiffany Holly, and three other employees locked themselves into an office, said restaurant manager Tito Lopez.

None of the employees were injured.

Graves expects to divert extra money from highway fund

BY DAVID MILES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Legislative leaders are cautious about using anticipated extra dollars from the state's highway fund to help alleviate state government's budget crunch.

"I wouldn't get too optimistic until we get the money in the bank," House Speaker Robin Jennison, R-Healy, said Thursday.

"I wouldn't get too optimistic until we get the money in the bank."

— Robin Jennison, House speaker

Duane Goossen, Gov. Bill Graves' budget director, said he thinks the highway plan will generate more money than originally thought.

Goossen met with Kansas Department of Transportation staff on Thursday, but he said it's too soon to guess how much more revenue will be available to lawmakers when they return in January.

"I'm very reluctant to put a figure on that now," Goossen said.

Estimates of how much additional revenue the highway plan will generate in range as high as $475 million over 10 years.

Any extra money would be welcome news to state officials, who are feeling the pinch of a tight budget.

The state finished its previous budget year on June 30 with $73.4 million less than expected in its general fund, the largest source of money for government programs.

Also, two weeks ago, the officials and economists who forecast revenue collections said the state would have to cut general-fund spending by more than $108 million over the next 20 months, absent a tax increase.

Graves said he expects to use projected extra revenues from the state's highway fund to help alleviate budget problems.

"Transportation will ante up a significant number of the dollars we need to get through the next year," Graves told The Wichita Eagle's editorial board earlier this week.

Senate Ways and Means Chairman Dave Kerr said it's premature to talk about any extra money that might come from the highway plan.

"I was a little surprised to see it brought up at this stage," Kerr, R-Hutchinson, said.

House Appropriations Chairman David Adkins said he thinks revenues from the highway plan could exceed projections by as much as $70 million through fiscal year 2001, which ends June 30 of that year.

The highway plan is financed by gas tax increases, bond sales and an increase in the amount of sales taxes transferred to the Department of Transportation.

Adkins said he thinks any additional money from the 10-year, $12.9 billion transportation plan should be used to fulfill legislators' commitment to public schools.

The Legislature is committed to increasing school budgets by $50 this school year and by the same amount next year. The per-pupil figure is $3,770 for this year and $3,820 for next year.

"I think we should put the money into pupils, not pavement," Adkins, R-Leawood, said.

Jennison and Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, also mentioned education as a high priority for spending any additional money from the highway fund.

That sentiment was shared by Rep. Phill Kline, R-Shawnee, who said the state's highway plan could bring in as much as $475 million more than expected.

Kline, the former chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, said he wants to divert $40 million from the transportation plan to increase per-pupil spending.

Transportation Secretary Dean Carlson noted that Kline used revenue projections over a 10-year period, meaning those funds aren't available now.

Carlson also said Kline did not consider the extra debt incurred by issuing bonds for the highway plan sooner than expected.

3rd defendant in dragging-death case convicted, sentenced to life in prison

BY C. BRYSON HULL
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JASPER, Texas —The last of three white men to stand trial for chaining James Byrd Jr. to the back of a pickup truck and dragging him to pieces was found guilty of murder but spared execution Thursday.

Shawn Allen Berry, who insisted he was just a frightened bystander, was sentenced to life in prison for one of the nation's grisliest racial crimes since the civil rights era. His roommates both were sentenced to death.

The all-white jury took 10 hours Wednesday and Thursday to convict him but only two hours to agree on a sentence. Berry, 24, must serve at least 40 years in prison before he has a chance of parole.

Jurors rejected Berry's pleas that he felt his own life was in danger by his companions.

"There was a day and time in this country when juries and cops ignored racial cases. Facts are facts, though, and they stayed with the facts," Jasper County District Attorney Guy James Gray said.

Prosecutors called no witnesses in the punishment phase but introduced evidence regarding Berry's prior convictions for burglary and drunken driving.

For the defense, nine people testified that Berry — who unlike his fellow defendants did not have a history of racist activities — did not meet the death-penalty test of being a future threat to society.

Among those witnesses were several of Berry's friends and a psychiatrist who testified against the other two defendants in their trials.

Byrd, a 49-year-old black man, was beaten, hooked to Berry's truck with a 24-foot logging chain, and dragged by his ankles over three miles of a country road last year.

Berry's roommates, avowed white supremacists John William King, 25, and Lawrence Russell Brewer, 32, were sentenced to die in separate trials earlier this year.

Prosecutors said Berry invited Byrd to join the three for a ride, helped chain him to the truck, and then drove during the dragging.

Berry, however, testified that he tried to stop the attack until King warned him that a "nigger lover" could meet the same fate that awaited Byrd. Berry claimed that he was so scared he wet his pants and did nothing further to intervene.

James Byrd Jr., a 49-year-old black man, was beaten, hooked to Shawn Berry's truck with a 24-foot-logging chain, and dragged by his ankles over three miles of a country road last year.

Berry also insisted it was King who drove the truck.

Testifying a second time in the punishment phase, Berry reasserted his innocence.

"Look across that jury and look at the Byrd family sitting right there and explain why you don't have any remorse in this crime," said Brit Featherston, a federal prosecutor helping local authorities.

"I am very sorry from what happened to Mr. Byrd, and I've said that from day one. I wanted to speak to the Byrd family personally, but I couldn't," Berry said.

Leaders meet, chastise action in Chechnya

BY TERENCE HUNT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ISTANBUL, Turkey — World leaders led by President Clinton admonished Boris Yeltsin on Thursday for Moscow's bloody military crackdown in Chechnya — prompting angry words from the Russian leader but also a concession for an outside look at the rebellious region.

"You have no right to criticize Russia for Chechnya," Yeltsin shot back at a chorus of rebuke from presidents and prime ministers at a summit of the 54-nation Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe. Rejecting calls for political mediation rather than a military solution, Yeltsin said, "There will be no negotiations with bandits and murderers."

Gathered around an oval table, Clinton chastised Yeltsin for an endless cycle of violence against innocent civilians in Chechnya. French President Jacques Chirac called Russia's air and ground assaults a tragic error. German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder said, "War is no way to eliminate terrorists."

Yeltsin said he was not interested in reproaches or sermonizing from his colleagues and gave no indication the criticism would have any effect on Russia's two-month-old military campaign to combat separatist rebels in the southern Russian region. Russia is locked in a battle with terrorists who have attacked Moscow and taken American, French, British and Russian hostages, Yeltsin said.

"We have a very good personal chemistry," Clinton said later, "but it didn't stop us from our clear disagreement here."

The leaders met in Ciragon palace, a former residence of Ottoman sultans on the European shore of the Bosporus, the strait dividing Europe and Asia.

Stormy winds nearly blew away a heavy red carpet on the palace's marble steps. Inside, Clinton and Yeltsin took one look at the rain and canceled a photo appearance outdoors.

The dispute over Chechnya dominated the summit, called to rewrite the charter of the Cold War-era organization to act faster to prevent conflict, protect human rights and promote democracy.

Clinton and other leaders decried what they describe as a growing refugee crisis in Chechnya as civilians flee the fighting.

Police arrest area resident for attempted murder, theft

Daarina Abduljaami, 20, of Junction City was arrested Wednesday at the Manhattan Town Center for attempted second-degree murder, criminal threats, battery and theft.

Officers from the Riley County Police Department were sent to the mall for a reported theft in progress at Dillards department store. It was then that Abduljaami, one of the theft suspects, attempted to flee the scene but was stopped by Rod Davis, a security guard for Dillards.

A struggle ensued, and Abduljaami allegedly took Davis' gun from his holster, pointed it at Davis and threatened to shoot him.

Officer Carla Swartz made the arrest. Bond was set at $50,000.

An accomplice of Abduljaami was Sharetta Mosley, 19, of Junction City. Mosley was also arrested for battery, theft and resisting arrest. Her bond was set at $500.

Commissioners vote to split cost of funding application

City and county commissioners decided Thursday to split the $25,000 cost to complete an application for Kansas Highway 18 improvements.

The city and county are applying for funds in the state's Comprehensive Transportation Plan, which earmarks $1.05 billion for Kansas highway improvements. The proposed project would upgrade Fort Riley Boulevard from Westwood Road to Ogden, Kan., to freeway design standards.

The application to the Kansas Department of Transportation could be enhanced by the city and county accepting maintenance responsibilities for Seth Child Road. The road is now designated a Kansas highway, leaving the state to pay for maintenance.

Although KDOT must accept the application for Fort Riley Boulevard improvements, other area highway improvements are already planned. K-18 will become a four-lane highway from Interstate 70 to Ogden, and improvements are planned for the intersection of Seth Child and Fort Riley Boulevard.

City and county commissioners will have a special meeting at 11:30 a.m. on Nov. 29 at City Hall to discuss the KDOT application.

K-State pulls out all stops to try to win recycling drive

K-State is going to extra lengths to try to win the America Recycles Day competition this year.

At the K-State vs. Missouri game on Saturday, students are invited to bring all of their aluminum cans to the blue recycling trailers in the parking lot of the stadium.

John Woods, director of facilities services said students can bring the cans and put them in the trailers or can ask the groundspeople at the game to put the cans there.

"Hopefully, all the cans that are used at the games and all the cans that people bring will increase the amount we get," Woods said.

Trailers will be located at the East Stadium lot, on the far east side of the lot off of the service road and at the West Stadium lot in front of Bramlage on the south end of the sidewalk.

Woods said the trailers have been set up in front of the K-State Student Union and near the residence halls.

"At the locations they have been at, there has not been many results," Woods said. "Maybe at the game we can get more participation."

$20,000 prize to be awarded to further musical education

It was announced on Nov. 1 that the 48th-annual BMI Student Composer Award competition will award $20,000 to new composers.

The BMI Composer Awards competition urges young composers to further their musical education through the help of cash prizes. Prizes in the range of $500 to $5,000 are awarded through the decision of a final panel of judges and entries are seen by this panel under a pseudonym. The submitted work has no limitations as far as instrumentation, style or length.

The competition is open to students who live in and are citizens of the Western Hemisphere and who are under the age of 26 on December 31,1999. Entries must be received by Feb. 11, 2000.

College of Agriculture picks October's student of month

The College of Agriculture has named Wendee Burch, senior in agricultural economics and horticulture, the student of the month for October.

Burch was chosen for the award due to her involvement in Block and Bridle, Ag Ambassadors, Golden Key National Honor Society and Alpha Gamma Rho Rhomates.

She has been to conventions in association with Block and Bridle and serves as the treasurer for the program. She has held positions as social chairwoman and as quiz bowl chairwoman for the Ag Ambassadors as well. She also has helped the College of Agriculture as a group leader for the Farmland Youth Leadership Conference and as a small-group facilitator for the agriculture orientation class.

During her years at K-State, Burch also has shown swine at the Little American Royal and has been an awards chairwoman for the livestock show that happens annually.

Debate pair takes 2nd place in weekend's regional meet

The debate duo of Kevin Zollman, sophomore in philosophy, and Katie Hatziavramidis, senior in humanities, took second-place standing at a regional competition in Edmond, Okla., over the weekend.

K-State beat teams from North Texas, UKMC and Emory University in the six preliminary rounds of the competition. It was not until the final round that K-State lost to a second team from Emory University, 2-1.

Zollman, along with Tyler Tigue, freshman in computer science, won individual honors for their success in the preliminary rounds.

K-State will compete again this weekend at Wake Forest University.

K-State professor receives award for journalism work

Janice Hume, assistant professor of journalism, was named the 1999-2000 winner of the Cruise Palmer Distinguished Professorship Award.

Hume began work at K-State in 1997 and teaches courses in history of journalism, gender issues and the media, mass communications in society, and news and feature writing.

Hume attended the University of Missouri School of Journalism, where she received her bachelor's degree in magazine, master's degree in journalism and doctorate in journalism.

While she attended UM, she was a graduate instructor, supervising instructor and editor and a research assistant.

Throughout her career, Hume has received awards such as being named "A Promising Professor" from the Association of Education in Journalism and Mass Communications.

She has researched the history of American journalism in correlation with American culture, early American periodicals, women and the media, the ethics of media and media management.

She has presented her research work during national conferences and has had her work printed in several publications.

Project Vote Smart enables students to follow elections

K-State students have the opportunity to join Project Vote Smart this winter to track presidential, congressional and state-level candidates for the 2000 election.

Project Vote Smart is asking students interested in a 10-week internship positions to apply to help with work on the 2000 election.

Project Vote Smart is a national library of factual information about all the political candidates.

Members perform political research and produce publications during the election coverage that are presented to the public and to political journalists.

The internship positions are available at Project Vote Smart's headquarters at the Great Divide Ranch in Montana. K-State students who agree to the 10-week internship can receive either free room and board or scholarships of up to $1,200 from a grant donated by the Hearst Foundation.

Students and recent graduates in the fields of political science, communications, journalism and computer science are encouraged by Project Vote Smart to apply.

THINKING OF YOU ON YOUR 25TH AND ALWAYS

JAMIE ADCOCK
11-19-74 ~ 6-11-99

If we had one lifetime wish
One dream that could come true
We'd pray to God so hard
For yesterday and you.
The things we feel so deeply
Are the hardest things to say,
But we, your family, love you
In a very special way.
They say memories are golden
Well maybe that is true,
But we never wanted memories
We only wanted you.
If teardrops were a stairway
And heartaches made a lane
We'd walk a path to heaven
And bring you back again.
A thousand times we needed you
A thousand times we've cried,
If our love could have saved you
You never would have died.

a taste of TWAIN

Award-winning actor to present performance as famous author at McCain Sunday

By CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lovers of literature often dream about getting the chance to meet their favorite author. Now, K-State has the chance to do so.

Well, sort of.

Actor Hal Holbrook will portray 19th-century American author Mark Twain in his one-man show, "Mark Twain Tonight," at 7 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium

In his act, Holbrook takes on the persona of Twain and speaks about current events. The show is based on Twain's own traveling lectures.

"These are the words of Mark Twain when he used to go on his lecture tours," said Thom Jackson, marketing director for McCain. "He gave commentaries and satire on political events of the time."

For 45 years, Holbrook, recipient of several Emmy Awards and a Tony Award, has tickled the funnybone of audiences nationwide as Twain; however, he is no stranger to the silver screen. Holbrook appeared opposite Tom Cruise in the legal thriller "The Firm" and recently appeared in the romantic comedy "The Bachelor."

Holbrook's K-State show originally was scheduled for September, Jackson said, but had to be postponed until this month because Holbrook was still working on the set of "The Bachelor."

Jackson said he thinks listening to Twain's opinion on today's issues will provide the audience with an unique perspective.

"Hal will be speaking as though Mark Twain were alive today, as if he were in those exact situations," Jackson said.

MORE INFO? For ticket information, contact the McCain box office at 532-6428.

Joel White, intern at McCain Auditorium and junior in mass communications, said he has spoken with Holbrook, and said Holbrook's viewpoints on the various topics will be strong.

"He has a lot of conservative opinions on how young people behave, and he seems to think young people have lost touch with humanity, that we spend too much time looking at a computer screen and not enough time looking into other people's eyes," White said.

White said many of the subjects about which Holbrook will speak are universal.

"There are a lot of issues that were pressing 100 years ago that are still relevant today," he said. "There are a lot of the same problems."

Jackson said he thinks Holbrook will enjoy what K-State has to offer, and that he will make a large impression on the students in attendance.

"Mr. Holbrook really enjoys speaking with students, and he believes young people make a difference in the world," Jackson said. "He believes they are very important to society."

Ani DiFranco continues to express herself in 13th album

Ani DiFranco

"To the Teeth"

There's something about Ani DiFranco setting out at the age of 20 to cut her niche in the music world — and becoming wildly successful — that makes one want to thrust a fist in the air in victory and shout, "Booyah."

In 1990, DiFranco started Righteous Babe Records with money borrowed from friends. She spent those first years driving around the country in a beat-up car, playing in seedy bars and university campuses.

Ten years later, DiFranco is selling out theaters. Her total catalog sales have reached $2.5 million, her last four albums have made Billboard's Top 200 list, her double-live album, "Living in Clip," has gone gold, and she has been nominated twice for a Grammy.

And all without the help of a mainstream record deal. No wonder she's been called every major label's worst nightmare.

DiFranco's success relied heavily on word of mouth, college and public radio airplay and reviews in small publications. Since then, her mailing list has gone from 100 old friends to 61,983 new ones. Her beat-up car has been replaced by a bus and two trucks, and her albums are not so hard to find anymore. She's been on the covers of countless magazines internationally, including Spin, The Advocate and Ms.

RBR is now home to a few more artists besides DiFranco. Folksinger/storyteller Utah Phillips has released two album-length collaborations with DiFranco on RBR, "The Past Didn't Go Anywhere" and "Fellow Workers." Two solo albums are also due up from Arto Lindsay and Sekou Sundiata.

DiFranco is a busy woman. She tours non-stop, and has released three, count them three, albums this year alone. "Up Up Up Up Up Up" was released in early January; "Fellow Workers" came along this summer and now "To The Teeth," which was release Nov. 16.

Politically charged and calmly full of rage, "To The Teeth" marks album 13 for DiFranco and, following in the tradition she began with 1996's "Dilate," this album is nothing like anything she's ever done before. Whether her die-hard, overprotective fans like this or not, one thing is certain: DiFranco is plowing her way through the patriarchy of the traditional music business, and she has come into her own.

DiFranco gave fans a taste of what to expect on her latest album during her summer 1999 tour with former James Brown sidekick Maceo Parker. She performed versions of the title track, "Hello Birmingham" and "Providence" during the summer tours. The lyrics of "To The Teeth" are particularly intense with such cutting lines as, "In the time it takes this cultural death wish to run its course, they're gonna make a pretty penny, and then they're all going to hell."

DiFranco's fierce political views are echoed in many of her songs, but "Hello Birmingham" does the least to sugarcoat reality. In concert, she describes the song as a conversation between her hometown of Buffalo, N.Y., and the southern city of Birmingham, Ala., on election day. Both cities have been scenes of bloody battles over abortion, and she sings, "What is it about Birmingham? What is it about Buffalo? That the hate-filled wanna build bunkers in your beautiful red earth, they wanna build them in our shiny white snow."

The diversity of guests performing on "To The Teeth," adds much to the album's originality. Parker contributes a variety of wind instruments to three tracks, and The Artist Formerly Known As Prince lends his vocals to back up "Providence."

"To The Teeth" is flavored with sentiments from DiFranco's last two albums, "Up Up Up Up Up Up" and "Little Plastic Castle" (1998) by way of a banjo here and a particular guitar sound there. For the most part, however,

COURTESY PHOTO

DiFranco delves into new territory with a sound that's all new and all her.

The album is loose and casual, with DiFranco's sometimes-caustic sometimes-silly wit apparent on every song; DiFranco's band members are relative newcomers to the Freakshow, but the combination is perfect.

Julie Wolf, who plays accordion and keyboards, clicks with DiFranco so well, it's hard to imagine DiFranco without her. Drummer Daren Hahn and bassist Jason Mercer are the driving rhythm section behind DiFranco's raging guitar and voice.

But so mellow is the overall attitude of this album, one could easily mistake it for merely a collection of songs (and it's not). It's pure DiFranco, and there's something very impossible to put into words about her music. In fact, it leaves fans drooling, unable to say anything more intelligible than, "Ani gooood ... so very gooooood." She is the epitome of woman, and one very (oh, I have to say it) righteous babe.

THE GONGFARMERS BY RANDY REGIER

dilbert BY SCOTT ADAMS

TEXAS A&M

The painstaking work was expected to continue into the night as rescuers tried to reach the two people seen in the debris.

"We take it one log at a time," Bennett said. "They're wired three together in stacks, so we have to cut the wire and move them one at a time. So it's a lengthy process."

Shocked students gathered at the scene, holding hands and praying while the rescue went on. Workers tapped on logs and ordered spectators to be still so they could hear if anyone was still alive.

Texas A&M sophomore Diana Estrada said she was about 200 yards away from the stack when it fell.

"It just toppled over, and the wires snapped, and the lights started sparking and going on and off," she said. "We ran over there as fast as we could, and we could see legs sticking out and hear people screaming."

Officials had no explanation for the collapse and said engineers would examine the site.

Sixty to 70 students were on top of the logs trying to build the stack when it suddenly gave way, university officials said.

"I was dazed. I was kind of thrown against the wall," sophomore Caleb Hill said. "For a while, I could see a few people trying to jump off the stack, get out from on top of it, out from underneath it."

Sophomore Michael Guerra, who was helping build the bonfire, had left for a few minutes and returned moments after the collapse.

"People were running around calling people's names and crying," Guerra said. "Other people were just like zombies. They couldn't believe what had happened."

Faculty adviser Rusty Thompson said students told him there was no hint of a problem until there was noise and chaos.

"There was just a sudden movement," he said. "Five to seven seconds, and it was on the ground."

"I've never seen anything like this," said student Patrick Freshwater, who was helping clear away the logs. "It's something you don't ever want to feel. I went to my class, and there was nobody there. The teacher wasn't even there, because no one can go to class when this is going on."

The bonfire, meant to get students fired up for the football game against archrival Texas, is a beloved tradition at Texas A&M and attracts tens of thousands of spectators.

Since the tradition began in 1909, when the school was still an all-male military academy, the bonfire has been canceled only one other time: in 1963, after President Kennedy's assassination.

This year's bonfire was to have been lit on Thanksgiving, the night before the big game.

Bowen said this year's bonfire would be canceled and said he was not sure if the bonfire would be permanently abolished.

"It's a very important tradition to us," he said, "but those decisions must be made at a calmer time."

Although the project is run by students, engineers and non-student adults are always at the site, Thompson said. The students cut the logs to lengths of about 10 feet and build the pile themselves over several weeks. Cranes and tractors lift the logs, which are then tied together with baling wire.

The structure, which this year would have included about 7,000 logs and reached 55 feet, is designed to twist inward and collapse on itself as it burns.

The stack also collapsed in 1994, but no one was injured. A second was built and ignited that year.

Both students and alumni have strong opinions about the bonfire.

A group calling itself Aggies Against Bonfire has called in the past for the abolition of the annual event, saying it wastes resources, pollutes the air and contributes to dozens of injuries and alcohol-related arrests each year.

Dallas Cowboys special teams coach Joe Avezzano, who was an assistant coach at A&M during the 1980s, said the ritual should go on. "It is part of the tradition and history," he said. "Thousands and thousands of people have been involved over the years, and that may be underestimating it."

Senior Kay Barrington suggested that this year's bonfire, at least, go on.

"My feeling is they won't get any closure if they just take it down. We could get it built again in five days, because you know, they died to build it," she said. "They wouldn't want to just put it away. They'd want to burn it."

Thursday's accident was the third disaster related to Texas A&M this fall.

On Sept. 18, five people were killed in the crash of a plane used by an A&M-connected skydiving club.

On Oct. 10, six students walking to a fraternity party not far from campus were killed by a pickup truck whose driver had fallen asleep, police said. One of the victims was from Texas A&M.

TAILGATING

He said his tailgating adventures began with a promotional tour for the city of New Orleans four years ago, and he quickly became engrossed in the concept of tailgating.

"After the first couple of weeks, I fell in love with tailgating," Cahn said.

Cahn began tailgating at the pro level, and he has now branched into the college game scene.

Cahn said he likes the differences between the two levels of football.

"In college, tailgating is the greatest of all networking possibilities a person has," Cahn said. "If you go up to a person at a reception, they are going to think you want something."

He also said the makeup of the college atmosphere can be more intimate, and he said it is good place for family and friends to come together.

He said it's a chance for parents to meet their children and friends on a neutral territory.

Cahn said tailgating receives an unfair disclaimer as just an excuse to party.

He said while there is some drinking that goes on, it is also a place for Americans to bond. In his job, Cahn said he has found a fascinating way to see America.

"One of the bad raps that tailgating gets is that it's a drunken party," Cahn said. "Some people use it as an excuse to drink, but as you walk around the parking lot, you can see that there are lots of people not there to get drunk."

Cahn said he has put about 100,000 miles on his motor home since he began his voyage from one tailgating party to the next.

He said he is enjoying seeing the country, after owning a cooking school for 15 years.

When Cahn goes to a game, he begins his day by making a pot of jambalaya, and then he spends the rest of the game walking around and interacting with the fans.

"I will spend time walking around the stadium observing one-upmanship, with the silver and chandeliers, to the people who grill the Vienna sausage and they open up a can of pork and beans," Cahn said.

He has a book coming out next year and a possible TV series in the works. Cahn said people who have never tailgated are missing out.

"I tell people who have never tailgated before to come out early, walk around and see how everything works," Cahn said. "Then they will find themselves falling in love with it."

Palestinians ask for compensation for Israeli occupation

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SHORESH, Israel — Palestinian negotiators raised a new demand Thursday during talks on a peace treaty — compensation for three decades of Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The new concept emerged during a 90-minute session between negotiating teams at an Israeli resort near Jerusalem. The Palestinians did not say how much money they are demanding.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak and other senior Israeli officials were in Istanbul, Turkey, for an international conference and had no comment on the Palestinian demand. Barak later left for the United States.

Israel and the Palestinians have set a target date of February for agreeing on a framework for the peace accord, with a goal of signing the full treaty next September.

Earlier, the two sides set an agenda for the talks, pledging to tackle the trickiest issues, including borders, Palestinian refugees, Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza, and the future of Jerusalem.

A deadlock continued to detain a parallel process, implementation of an interim accord. Israel was to have turned over an additional 5 percent of the West Bank to Palestinian civilian control on Monday. However, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat rejected the Israel's withdrawal map prepared. Arafat wants territory in primary Palestinian population centers.

Israel counters that the decision about what land to hand over is Israel's alone. Before leaving for Istanbul and the United States, Barak insisted that Israel's map must be implemented.

The interim arrangements are not supposed to influence the peace treaty talks, according to the original agreements, but both sides appear to relate to the territorial handovers as precedents for future borders.

At Thursday's talks about a peace treaty, Palestinian negotiators presented their ideas about Jerusalem. They said the city should remain open and undivided, with one section serving as the capital of a Palestinian state and the other as the capital of Israel.

Israel has said it will never relinquish sovereignty over all of Jerusalem. It captured the eastern Arab section of the city in the 1967 Middle East war and annexed it shortly afterwards.

The Palestinian plan for Jerusalem was part of a document released by the Palestinian Information Ministry, outlining its proposals for a peace treaty.

Most of the positions outlined in the document were well known.

The Palestinians demanded that Israel withdraw from all the land it captured in the 1967 Mideast war, including the West Bank, Gaza Strip and east Jerusalem.

Palestinian refugees displaced in Mideast wars would have to be compensated or allowed to return to their homes, and all Jewish settlements would have to be dismantled, the ministry said.

Murphy

After a rocky road during his junior season at K-State last year, Frank Murphy has proven to be a force in the Big 12 at running back. With his blazing 4.22 second 40-yard dash speed, Murphy has sped by opposing defenses this year for 504 yards, despite missing four games with an ankle injury. Murphy displays an impressive 6.1 yards per carry as well.

Chapman

For four years, Lamar Chapman has been roaming center field at strong safety. In that time, Chapman has established himself as one of many great defensive backs to play for the Cats. Last season, he earned his second All-Big 12 honor in his career. This season, he ranks third on the team in tackles with 63 and No. 1 on the team in interceptions with five. He anchors the nation's No. 1 pass defense, just one aspect of the country's No. 4 overall defensive unit.

Helm

Quarterback Adam Helm joined the Wildcats as a walk-on in 1995 and got his chance to play in nine games last season by backing up Michael Bishop. This season as a senior, he started one game but has seen action in all 10 contests. Helm also helped orchestrate a 21-point come-from-behind victory at Iowa State this season, passing for 67 yards, completing on seven of 11 attempts.

Simoneau

Mark Simoneau has been the anchor of the Wildcat defense for the past four seasons at linebacker, ranking third all-time on K-State's career tackle list. He's led K-State in tackles for three of his four seasons as a starter. Simoneau is a finalist for the Butkus Award, given annually to the nation's top linebacker. This season, Simoneau has recorded 80 tackles, 17 for a loss, which leads the Big 12 Conference. He is only the second player in school history to be named a team captain three times. Simoneau was a second-team All-American pick as a junior and is in the running for another this season.

McIntosh

Dennon McIntosh has been a great asset to K-State over the years, considering he has switched from being an All-Big 12 selection at defensive tackle in 1998 to offensive tackle this season. After starting nine games at left offensive tackle as a sophomore, and then switching to the defensive side of the ball his junior year, he made yet another switch, once again to offense to help solidify a young offensive line his senior season. McIntosh ranked fifth on the team in tackles as a junior with 51.

Litton

After walking on at K-State five years ago, Travis Litton has solidified himself at the strongside linebacker position this season. As a junior, he saw significant playing time backing up Travis Ochs. Litton is best known for teaming up with former K-State linebacker Jeff Kelly last season to knock Kansas quarterback Zac Wegner out of the season with what has been called "the hit." This season Litton has posted 38 tackles, 1.5 sacks and an interception.

Howard

In 1999, Darren Howard became K-State's all-time career sack leader with 29. As a junior, the defensive end led K-State and the Big 12 with 10.5 sacks, while collecting first-team All-Big 12 honors by the the conference coaches and The Associated Press. Howard ranks fifth on the team with 47 tackles and second on the team with 5.5 sacks.

Your heart goes with them, but when this season is over, it's time for them to move on as it is with every senior class.

Coach Bill Snyder

Hopes of happy ending fill seniors' minds before final regular-season game

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER

One last hurrah.

On Saturday, 12 K-State seniors will embark on their last football game at KSU Stadium when they are host to the Missouri Tigers in the regular-season finale.

"I appreciate them so much," head coach Bill Snyder said. "They've been such a gift to this program, but by the same the token they have been fortunate in the program to be in a position to win as many football games as they have, to have as few losses as they have had.

"It's a two-way street, quite obviously, as that would always be the case. Your heart goes with them, but when this season is over, it's time for them to move on as it is with every senior class. You always miss them. You'd like to have them with you forever, but that's not appropriate either."

Despite losing their national championship hopes against Nebraska last weekend in an embarrassing 41-15 loss, K-State (9-1, 6-1) and many of those seniors will be counted on to finish this season strong, without, mind you, a repeat of last season.

With that in mind, Missouri (4-6, 1-6), which has lost five of its past six contests, will be entering Manhattan with the hopes of foiling a happy ending to a Wildcat football season that still has hopes of receiving a BCS Alliance Bowl berth.

"We're still in our season, and we can't let happen to us what happened a year ago," Snyder said following the loss to the Huskers. "We let that loss in St. Louis get us beat in San Antonio. I just don't want this football team to let this loss get us beat in Manhattan against the University of Missouri."

Junior defensive end Monty Beisel echoed Snyder's sentiments, saying that with Missouri coming to town, this isn't the time to dwell on the past because they can't afford to, or a carbon-copy of last season is eminent.

"They have a great club," Beisel said. "They're one of our rivals. They come in here and get excited and being our last home game, senior day, and probably their last game of the season, it's going to be a great game. They're going to come here ready to play, and we have to be ready to play too, or we're going to walk out of there like we did last Saturday, and we don't want that to happen."

One difference between last year's Missouri squad and this year's is the quarterback position. Last season, the versatile Corby Jones passed and ran over and around defenses, but this year they have experienced obvious hits at the signal-caller post.

A month ago against Iowa State, redshirt freshman Kirk Farmer broke his leg, and since then sophomore Jim Dougherty has had to take a stronger role on the team in terms of more playing time. Freshman Justin Gage has seen some time as well. Dougherty has passed for 1,288 yards, completing 51 percent of his passes en route to leading a Missouri offense to 360 yards per game.

"They've lost some of their playmakers, but at the same time they're very sound with what they do," defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said. "They have a power running game and play-action pass series off of it. Their biggest deficiency to this point has been their ability to get on the perimeter with a quarterback like they did with Corby."

Snyder said Gage possesses the same option style of football that Farmer did in his six games this season, which in turn makes defending them a little bit harder to do.

"The youngest of the two appears to be a young guy that come in to fill the void as far as option football and some of the other things that a running quarterback would do, and that puts them back in the mode that they were in before Farmer was injured," Snyder said.

"In a way of thinking, that makes them a more diversified offense and consequently more difficult to defend against."

The Tigers, on the other hand, don't have a dilemma at running back. Senior DeVaughn Black and sophomore Zain Gilmore both have ran for 700-plus yards this year and both post a solid yards-per-carry average at 4.4 and 4.1 respectively.

Big 12 Lineup

Oklahoma (6-3, 4-2) at Texas Tech (5-5, 4-3), 11:00 a.m.

Oklahoma junior quarterback Josh Heupel looks to guide the Sooners to their first bowl berth since 1994, but the Texas Tech Red Raiders are trying to attain the same thing, which would be their sixth appearance in the past seven seasons. The Sooners are coming off a 31-10 win at Iowa State last week, while the Red Raiders are looking to bounce back from a devastating 51-7 loss to Texas, the worst loss in Tech history.

Iowa State (4-6, 1-6) at Kansas (4-7, 2-5), 1 p.m.

This game features a matchup of probably two of the most improved programs in the Big 12 in 1999. Despite the 1-6 and 2-5 conference marks by the Cyclones and Jayhawks, both have seen many top-25 opponents. Both teams' seasons have been marred with up and down performances. Iowa State lost to K-State and Texas, both top-10 teams, by a combined 10 points. Kansas put a big scare into the hearts of Nebraska in a 24-17 loss three weeks ago.

Oklahoma State (4-5, 2-4) at Baylor (1-9, 0-7), 1 p.m.

The Cowboys enter the game still needing two wins to be in contention for their second bowl berth in three seasons. Although the Bears have struggled mightily all season, Saturday could be their day for an upset, considering the Cowboys have gone downhill since K-State's 44-21 come-from-behind win Oct. 23, losing two of their past three contests. The Bears lead the series between the two schools, 11-6.

Gavin Peries, former K-State wide receiver

Linebacker's journey ends with long list of credentials

It all started with a brotherly challenge for Mark Simoneau.

Equipped with a mini-football and an entire living room to build momentum, Simoneau had to conquer his two brothers — 8 and 10 years older, mind you — to cross the "goal line" and buck the pecking order that comes with being the youngest brother in a family.

Did Simoneau rip through his brothers like so many offensive lineman he's faced at K-State?

"I'd be running across the room as hard as I could, and they'd light me up," he said, reflecting on his earliest memory of football.

These were the days before the dominance, the groundwork that started on Jan. 16, 1977, in Phillipsburg, Kan., Simoneau's birthplace, and continued through Smith Center, Kan., the same town that produced Wildcat linebacker Brooks Barta.

For the past five years, Simoneau has continued his steady diet of dedication, discipline and determination in Manhattan. The only thing that's really changed since his arrival is the hair, which has evolved from standard flattop into Samson-like strands. His tour of duty has included a freshman-record 111 tackles and freshman-of-the-year honors in 1996, second-team All-American honors in 1998 and being named a semifinalist for the Butkus Award this season.

That's only half of what makes Simoneau the greatest linebacker in K-State history. A lot of players compile impressive statistics throughout their collegiate careers but can't find a permanent home in the NFL. Brian Bosworth made a killing off his image before reality, and Bo Jackson, came crashing through.

Simoneau doesn't suffer from this. He's always been substance over style. The closest he's come to celebrating a bone-jarring sack is pumping his fists. Leave it to LaVar Arrington for the dance routines.

"Student-athlete" doesn't really do Simoneau justice. He's more of an athletic student of the game. Every play is broken down and analyzed, each opponent dissected. Defensive coordinator Phil Bennett calls Simoneau the only player he's ever coached who strives as hard as any coach to figure out anything that will give him an advantage.

Think back to the Texas game Oct. 2. In the second half, Simoneau was always locked on Major Applewhite. One play, he's reading the Longhorns' QB and picking off a pass for a 37-yard touchdown. The next series he's in the backfield, stripping Applewhite for a turnover that led to another K-State score and opened up a game that had been close. All of these plays were the result of time in the film room and finding the little things that can be exposed.

Simoneau is not a physical giant. Standing only 6 feet tall and weighing in at 240 pounds, he easily could be mistaken for a stocky running back, a position he played in high school. But every inch of his frame has been conditioned for the style of play a linebacker encounters. What he lacks in power, he makes up for in prowess.

Sadly, the chance to witness Simoneau's play is running out. Saturday is his final performance at KSU Stadium. Beyond a possible Big 12 Championship and bowl game, Simoneau's journey will continue elsewhere than Wagner Field.

Don't take this opportunity for granted. A quiet person by nature, Simoneau is easy to overlook, something that's worked as an advantage on the field.

Simoneau steadily has pumped the blood through a top-five defense many expected to drop off after linebackers Jeff Kelly and Travis Ochs departed after last season. Despite the Cats' big deficits at Iowa State and Oklahoma State, Simoneau remained focused, confident that everything would work out all right.

And it has. K-State once again contended for the national title and should finish out playing into the new year. Simoneau's contribution to this is immeasurable.

The quiet kid who couldn't even best his older brothers in a game of breakthrough has cracked through some of the best offenses in the nation. All of it has been done modestly and in the spirit of team, not personal glory.

Here's to you, Mark. Saturdays won't be the same without silent No. 42 guiding the defense.

Simoneau ranks among best of K-State defense

By RICHARD SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

best \'best\ adj. 1: good or useful in the highest degree: most excellent

Useful. Good. Excellent. Just a few of the adjectives that have tried and failed, like so many blockers, to capture Mark Simoneau.

As the Wildcat linebacker has progressed through a spectacular career, he has shed layer after layer of superlative, his heroics transcending the boundaries of the description at each step of the way.

Simoneau is one of only two players to thrice be voted team captain. His list of significant awards and accolades almost equals the 396 career tackles which place him third in K-State's annals.

As he prepares to take the field at KSU Stadium a final time against Missouri on Saturday, there is only one question left about Simoneau. Only one word remains that could hope to quantify him.

Is Simoneau the best linebacker in K-State history?

"I could not tell you that we've had one better, and we've had some extremely fine players at that position," K-State head coach Bill Snyder said.

"He's right there at the top, with all of them," defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said. "He's the complete package."

best n. 1: the best state or part

Certainly, Simoneau has been one of the best parts of K-State's formidable defense since taking over the "Will" linebacker slot as a redshirt freshman in 1996.

During his tenure, he has twice led the team in tackles (including this season) and finished second twice.

His 52 tackles-for-loss are good for second on K-State's career list. With Simoneau disrupting the opposition, the Wildcats have finished 16th, fourth, third and fourth again this year nationally in total defense.

He has made his mark not with superior size or speed, for at 6 feet and 240 pounds, he possesses neither. It his preparation, his knowledge of the game, and his uncanny instincts that have secured Simoneau's place in Wildcat history.

"If the ball's over here, he's over here. If it's over there, he's over there. If it's behind you, he's back there. He's just wherever it happens to be," Snyder said.

best n 2: one that is best (trying to be the best)

"I probably embarrass Mark, because I do hold him up to our football team on some occasions," Snyder said. "I've never been around a player who is able to focus and prepare for a contest as Mark does. To me, its the consummate level of preparation that you'd like to see all of your players be involved with."

From his high school days in Smith Center, Kan., where he eschewed Saturday night parties to run extra laps, to his work on the K-State practice field, Simoneau is a model of dedication. His flawless performances each Saturday afternoon look choreographed only because they have been.

"You've done it so many times in repetitions in practice that it just starts to happen," Simoneau said. "It's just like second nature to you when you're out there. Sometimes you don't even feel what you're doing, you just react and do it."

best n. 3: one's maximum effort (do your best)

The intense preparation, the hours spent looking for the smallest of edges, have yielded a senior season that is shaping up to be the best of an exceptional career. Simoneau leads the Wildcats in tackles, unassisted tackles and sacks, and his 17 tackles-for-loss lead the entire Big 12, among his many statistical accomplishments.

He has been named Big 12 player of the week three times and is a finalist for the Butkus Award, college linebacking's highest honor.

Despite his ascent to college football's elite, Simoneau remains humble, refusing to join in the debate over his place in K-State linebacking history.

"It's fine with me if people want to say nice things about me," Simoneau said. "I'm not going to say that. There have been a lot of great linebackers here."

Though he stops short of declaring Simoneau K-State's greatest, the value Snyder places on his contributions is clear.

"He's obviously a great player, I think we all understand that, if you've been around him, you realize he's just a great person as well," Snyder said.

"He has had as positive an impact on this program as you could possibly imagine."

Murphy excels despite numerous catastrophes

■ Murphy says setbacks helped him move nearer to God, grow personally.

BY FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Considering what Frank Murphy has been through at K-State, it almost would have been easier for the running back to give up.

But after overcoming countless catastrophes, including NCAA violations and career-threatening injuries, the thought never even crossed his mind.

"There has been a lot of pain involved, but I have fought through it," Murphy said.

"I've learned a lot. I've gotten stronger. I've gotten closer to God and worked on myself on the inside."

Murphy came to K-State in spring 1998 as a highly recruited running back from Garden City Community College.

He was supposed to be a key contributor in the Wildcat backfield that season.

Then just weeks before K-State was scheduled to play its first game, Murphy received his first of several setbacks in Manhattan.

He was suspended for four games by the NCAA for his part in a scandal involving a K-State booster. Nevertheless, Murphy ended the year strong, rushing for 257 yards on only 55 carries and scoring five touchdowns in 1998.

"I was disappointed, because I wanted to help my team win and I couldn't. That hurt me more than anything."

— Frank Murphy, K-State running back

Murphy, who has been clocked in the 40-yard dash at 4.22 seconds, went into his senior season hoping for a record year.

"I wanted to rush for over a thousand yards before I got hurt," he said "But everything happens for a reason. Hopefully, with two, maybe three games to go I can make up for it."

He was listed as the No. 1 running back before breaking his foot in summer conditioning drills. He returned ahead of schedule, though, and sprinted for 149 yards in the season opener.

Murphy seemed to put his past behind him and was focused on playing football. Once again, everything was set in place for Murphy to have a marquee year. He followed up his performance against Temple with 156 yards against UTEP and 93 yards against Iowa State.

Just when the situation couldn't get any better for him, however, Murphy was injured again.

In K-State's 35-17 victory over Texas, Murphy severely sprained his ankle.

He had surgery on the ankle and missed the next four games for the Wildcats.

He returned against Colorado and played against Nebraska, but he was forced to leave the game once again because of ankle pain.

"That taught me how to play with pain," he said.

"I wanted to play against Nebraska. I was disappointed, because I wanted to help my team win and I couldn't. That hurt me more than anything."

Despite all of the disappointments, Murphy has learned more about himself and his relationship with God.

"This has helped me grow up, mature more," he said.

"Bad situations have helped me focus on what's at hand and what's in life. It made me realize that there is more to life than just football."

Murphy, who is scheduled to graduate with a degree in sociology and marketing, didn't learn just in the classroom or on the football field — he also learned from head coach Bill Snyder.

"It's hard for me to trust people, but I trusted Coach Snyder," he said. "I'm going to miss him. He was always there for me through good times and through the bad."

Wide receiver Quincy Morgan, Murphy's roommate and teammate, said he admires Murphy not just for his athletic talent, but for his personality.

"A lot of people don't know him and about his past," Morgan said. "But I do. I am going to miss him. Not Frank the football player, but Frank the person. He is one of the nicest guys you will ever meet."

As Murphy prepares for his last home game in Manhattan and his long, strange journey as a Wildcat comes to a close, he still has no regrets and just wants to play football.

"I have no regrets about my decision to come to K-State," he said.

"I'm just going to go out and run until my legs fall off. I will play my heart out for the fans. Hopefully, everything else will fall into place."

Linebacker to take memories of 'The Hit,' life lessons with him after graduation

BY MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Twenty years from now, K-State fans might not remember when senior Travis Litton was the starting strongside linebacker during the 1999 season.

They might not remember that he earned three letters at K-State and played extensively on special teams his sophomore year and as a backup linebacker his junior year.

But they will remember "The Hit."

In his first start as a Wildcat last season, Litton and Jeff Kelly obliterated KU quarterback Zac Wegner in a Wildcat sandwich, a hit that many enthusiasts call the greatest collision in team history.

"I remember getting up and seeing him on the ground, laid back," Litton said. "I was just hoping he'd be all right. This is still a game, and you have to be able to live a life afterwards."

Litton's life upon his graduation from K-State will be led using tools he has learned while playing football under head coach Bill Snyder.

"The lessons of life," Litton said of what Snyder has taught him. "How to manage time, how to be responsible for my actions, either good or bad. Just work hard. You set a goal, you can reach it if you just work hard — it's all up to you."

Just five short years ago, Litton was playing high school football in Beloit, Kan. As a running back, Litton rushed for more than 3,000 yards during his career. Despite his success, only community colleges and small Division II schools offered him scholarships, so he chose to walk on at K-State.

"It was a growing program, so why not join something that's getting better?" Litton said. "I just thought, 'Why not go somewhere where I can get a good reward?'"

While Litton has enjoyed his stay in Manhattan, players and coaches insist it is they who have been rewarded by Litton's presence on the team.

"Travis has played a big part in what we've done," defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said. "He's played a lot of reps, even though some of them were practice reps behind Travis Ochs, but he's done a very nice job for us this year."

Sophomore linebacker Ben Leber echoed those sentiments.

"He's just a fun player to be on the field with," Leber said. "It's going to be a big loss just because he's such a great player and he's such a great person to be around."

Litton almost wasn't around past his first year in Manhattan.

"You had your days at the beginning, you're going, 'Man I'm playing defense, I've never played defense,'" Litton said. "I hurt my shoulder as a freshman, and all my friends out of high school were having fun and here I am all afternoon out here — until the first game I got to suit up for, and that was kind of my pay.

"I'm glad I stuck with it."

While the end of Litton's tenure as a member of the K-State football team is near, he is savoring every possible moment he has left.

"It doesn't seem like that long ago I was checking out my pads as a freshman. The years go by fast and I guess that shows just how much fun you have," Litton said.

"The end hasn't dawned on me, it hasn't sunk in and it won't sink in until next semester when I'm sitting around thinking, 'Man, I wish I had something to do.'"

Chapman follows tradition of K-State defensive backs

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

File Photo by Collegian Staff

Lamar Chapman wraps up a Utah State player in a game at KSU Stadium earlier this season. The Cats went on to win the game, 40-0.

Tradition.

Senior free safety Lamar Chapman is one of a long line of great K-State defensive backs.

"It was an experience playing with some of the guys that I played with," he said. "Chris Canty, Mario Smith, Joe Gordon — seeing the things that they've done, it reflected on me and showed me how a secondary plays."

This Saturday, Chapman will join the tradition, stepping on Wagner Field for one final time.

"I just want to go out for the last time and play the best that I can with this team," he said. "This is my last home game, and I just want to make it special."

"It hasn't really sunk into me yet," he said. "It'll probably hit me Saturday when we're getting ready to go out on the field."

This season, Chapman was selected as a team captain, helping lead a Wildcat defense that ranks fourth nationally, including No. 1 in pass efficiency defense.

"I think the attitude that all the defensive players have here is that they want to make the defense better and better each year," Chapman said. "That's just a goal that we have here. That's what I think this program is built around."

Defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said Chapman has been an unbelievable part of the Wildcat program, and there's no question that he'll play at the next level.

"Everything we've asked him to do, he's done it and done it well," Bennett said. "His leadership, his actions — he's a team guy, and he's a playmaker."

Chapman said he learned more than football from his experience at K-State — he learned lessons about life.

"I think no matter what I do in life, I can always reflect back to the experiences and the things that I had here at Kansas State," he said. "Coach Snyder — he's done a lot for me. He's helped me to become a man. All the coaches have done something special for me."

Chapman arrived at K-State in 1995, a three-sport standout at Liberal High School. As a quarterback, he rushed for 1,160 yards and 25 touchdowns his senior year, leading the Redskins to the 5A State Championship and earning him first-team all-state honors.

"When I came on my recruiting trip — just the way the guys treated me — I felt real comfortable coming to K-State and playing for this team," Chapman said.

Wildcat fans are happy he did.

Chapman, a first team All-Big 12 Conference selection in 1998, has been a four-year starter for K-State. An All-American candidate for 1999, he has recorded five interceptions, ranking him No. 16 in the nation, as well as 63 total tackles.

He also shares the longest punt return in Big 12 Conference and school history with a 94-yarder against Ohio in 1997.

Chapman's teammates said he has been an instrumental part of the Wildcat football program.

"Everything you see me doing, I learned from Lamar Chapman," strong safety Jarrod Cooper said. "Every time I hit somebody or make a play, I got that from Chap. He's been teaching me a lot, and he's going to keep on teaching me until he leaves."

Wide receiver Quincy Morgan said it's been tough going up against such a great defensive back like Chapman in practice everyday.

"When I go against Lamar, I have to bring out the best in me," Morgan said. "If I can go against him everyday in practice, I can go against anybody."

The Cats' offense for the game is still up in the air following the Nebraska game.

Junior running back Joe Hall's playing status is still unsure due to disciplinary reasons, which means junior David Allen or senior Frank Murphy could start. Also, junior quarterback Jonathan Beasley still is trying to recoup from a shoulder injury suffered prior to the Baylor game on Oct. 30.

Last week, in what was Beasley's worst performance of the season, he completed just three of 19 passes for 100 yards, 55 of which came on one play to receiver Quincy Morgan.

Whether Beasley's shoulder injury is serious or not, sophomore wide receiver Aaron Lockett did not say that was the downfall of a K-State offense that produced just 234 total yards against the nation's No. 2 defense. Entering the Nebraska matchup, the Cats had been averaging nearly 400 yards a game, even with inconsistency being their toughest foe.

"I noticed that he was hurt, but I don't think it hindered his performance as much as people would expect," Lockett said.

"If he was that hurt, he wouldn't have played."

As far as K-State's offensive unit is concerned, Lockett said it just needs to go back to the drawing board try to do what it did prior to the game in Lincoln.

"I kind of want to go out there and just reassure ourselves and to execute the things that we didn't do last week against Nebraska," he said.

Cats for Cans to collect food for area needy

By KATIE LAUX
Kansas State Collegian

Cats for Cans wants no one to go hungry during the holidays.

During this weekend's football game, Cats for Cans will be having a canned-food drive to collect food for holiday baskets. Seven gates at KSU Stadium will be equipped with large receptacles for donated canned food to be deposited. Also, members of the Student Academic Advisory Board will peruse the parking lot with shopping carts to collect even more cans from tailgaters and other fans.

The canned food donated will go toward the Flint Hills Breadbasket, which then will distribute the food to Manhattan families in need.

Carmen Wright, junior in kinesiology and member of the Student Academic Advisory Board, said she promotes the Breadbasket cause because it helps many people in need.

"Donating food is a worthy cause and has been very successful in the past," she said.

"The Student Academic Advisory Board hopes to further expand the previous efforts of the Breadbasket."

Bob Cavello, assistant athletics director, said the project was initiated by Ruth Ann Wefald. The athletic department as well as the Student Academic Advisory Board were more than willing to help in any way they could, he said.

Cavello said the Manhattan community and the K-State student population show great support for the student athletes, and the athletes are thrilled with the opportunity to be able to give back to their community.

"This is a great opportunity for our student athletes to show how much they care about the community that cares so much about them," Cavello said.

Last year's goal was to raise 175,000 pounds of nonperishable canned goods in Manhattan, and Cavello said the K-State campus alone raised 175,000.

The goal is the same this year, he said.

"We want to be the meat and potatoes of the collection," he said.

He said they plan to meet and exceed this year's goal, and he said they hope the Student Academic Advisory Board will raise about 50,000 pounds.

"Being a student is difficult, and money is tight. But I don't think it is too much to ask for everyone to find that one can of green beans that they probably won't eat anyway and donate it to a good cause," Wright said.

The holidays are a hard time for some families, especially families who can't afford to have a holiday meal, said Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Breadbasket. The Breadbasket wants to make the holiday a little easier by taking away the stress of finding the funds for a big meal.

"Cats for Cans is student-run, and the goal is to raise food and funds. During this time of year, we try to have the makings of a holiday meal with turkey or chicken, potatoes, fruits and vegetables, flour, bread — just about everything you would need to have a good holiday meal," Bramhall said.

The Breadbasket has had 15,000 families sign up for the holiday baskets, so there are plenty of people out there in need of help, Bramhall said.

Free-speech zone changes planned

■ Tree canopy, water fountain, dining terrace among planned renovations for area by Union.

By TRACY DOILE
Kansas State Collegian

The free-speech zone will take on a new look when the exterior phase of the K-State Student Union renovations begins in the spring.

"It was part of the original plan," Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union, said. "It was always planned to be done at the end of the project."

Connaughton said that when the process of planning the Union's renovations began four or five years ago, about 10 committees were formed.

"Each committee had to dissect a portion of the Union and take it to the next level," he said. "That's how the ball got rolling."

The Ken Ebert Design Group, the firm in charge of the free-speech zone improvements, has taken the ball and ran with it.

Rob Westberg, architect for The Ken Ebert Design Group, said the current free-speech zone's streets will be completely dozed as part of the base bid project. New pavement will extend from the entrance of the Union to the entrance of Seaton Hall, he said. A grid of trees conceived as a tree canopy area will alter the look as well.

Westberg said other additions of the renovated free-speech zone could include three component parts: an outside dining terrace, a water feature or fountain, and a speech platform. Bid prices at the first of the year will indicate the chances of these component parts fitting into the $1 million budget. If the base bid project is under budget after completion, the component parts will be added one by one until cost is reached.

Westberg also said snow-melting equipment for the pavement is a part of the alternate plans.

"We've left space for these items, even if they're not built initially," he said.

Westberg said the component parts provide naming opportunities if they aren't built initially. He said alumni could donate funds for the construction of any of the three component parts as a dedication.

"There's always the chance someone will step up and say, 'That's important to have,'" he said.

Connaughton said these types of outdoor areas are popular at campuses in the southern part of the United States. For example, he said ,at the University of Texas-Austin, an outdoor area is used in the same way the Union's inside courtyard is used — for entertaining activities and exhibits. He said outdoor areas are also common in states like Florida and Arizona.

"Those kinds of areas are quite popular for students to take advantage of the outdoors," he said. "We could have made good use of it until mid-November."

Cindy Debes, junior in English, works in the architecture library in Seaton Hall. She said she frequents the Union often since it is so close to her workplace.

"I usually hang out in the Union. I meet a friend for lunch every Friday," she said. "It'd be nice, with wonderful weather, to have a nice study area outside. I'm sure it'll look nice when it's done."

Connaughton said many of the renovations to the Union are not visible to students. He said the K-State Union Bookstore, Union Food Court and the plaza changes will be the three-

Library's primary donor dies

■ Service scheduled for Tuesday in Prairie Village, Kan., for man after whom Hale was dedicated.

By JENNIFER RYAN
Kansas State Collegian

Herman Darrell "Joe" Hale, a primary contributor to Hale Library, died Saturday at St. Joseph Health Center.

"We really can thank him for the fact that Hale Library exists today," Brice Hobrock, dean of Libraries, said. "He and his wife, Joyce, came forward in 1992 as anonymous donors for the major portion of the $5 million in private funding needed to build the library. They are the reason that we finally have a facility that can accommodate the students at K-State."

Gary Hellebust, president and CEO of the KSU Foundation, said Hale was a true supporter of academics and an inquisitive, intelligent person.

"He was a bigger-than-life character. He was warm, but somewhat reserved — very inquisitive. He wanted to learn just so he would know and increase his awareness," Hellebust said. "He was very pro-academic and wanted to support the library because he felt it would be supporting all academics at K-State and not just one part."

Hale was born April 12, 1925, in Woodston, Kan., to Carl Raymond Hale and Mayme E. Dunn Hale. He was raised in Downs, Kan., and graduated from Downs High School in 1943.

Hale enlisted in the Navy during World War II and served in the Pacific until 1946. He attended the University of Kansas through the G.I. Bill and graduated in 1949 with a bachelor's degree

Flag football teams compete at regionals

STORY AND PHOTOS BY MIKE SHEPHERD

The women of Kappa Alpha Theta had hoped to top their third-place finish in last year's regional flag football tournament.

But their hopes were dashed Sunday in Lincoln, Neb., when they were defeated by the Lady Miners of Missouri-Rolla,14-6, finishing third once again.

"We were bummed," Anne Hays, junior in elementary education, said after Theta's return to Manhattan. "But that team we played was intense, and they were some big girls."

Hays said she thought this year's team was better than last year's, but the members had a good time even though they didn't advance to the championship game.

A first-place finish by any of K-State's two male or two female teams would have advanced K-State to the national flag football championship in New Orleans in December.

"It's the Sugar Bowl of flag football," said Seth Thibault, captain of the Naked Bootleggers and senior in management.

K-State's three other teams in the tournament also advanced to Sunday's play.

The Bootleggers made it to the semi-finals before they were defeated 7-12 by Team Naden of the University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

"We should have won that game, but we ran out of guys and energy," Hank Doering, junior in microbiology, said.

The Bootleggers were ahead most of the game, but a scoring drive late in the second half by Team Naden ate up most of the clock and any chances for another Bootlegger score.

"There was only two minutes left, and that wasn't enough time for us to score," Doering said.

Polk High, K-State's other men's team, also was defeated 20-14 in its second game Sunday.

"We had three guys who couldn't go with us, so we had to pick up a

The long-awaited apex of the women's cross country team's season is here. The Cats travel to Bloomington, Ind., to compete for the NCAA Championship today.

The No. 9 Cats return to the course after winning the Midwest Regionals for the second consecutive year. Freshman Amy Mortimer, who led the team last week, said winning the Midwest adds momentum going into this meet.

"I think it just helps to build our confidence," Mortimer said. "We all know that we can run well and we're just ready to go."

Junior Jean-Paul Niyongabo qualified as an individual on the men's side.

In last week's meet, Niyongabo gashed his leg on another runner's spikes and received 11 stitches after the meet.

2 dead, 106 hurt in 4-bus accident

By DAN ROBRISH
The Associated Press

WHITE HAVEN, Pa. — Four charter buses loaded with Penn State University students crashed on a foggy interstate early Sunday, killing a student and a bus driver and injuring at least 106 people, authorities said.

The four buses were among six carrying 280 students home from a shopping trip to New York City. University President Graham Spanier said the buses drove into a thick wall of fog on Interstate 80 just after midnight.

In the ensuing chain-reaction wreck, three buses smashed into one another, and a fourth hit a guard rail. A pickup truck and two cars also became tangled in the wreckage.

"Everybody wanted to see Rockefeller Center before Christmas. We were really looking

Turkish government offers to house victims of quake

ISTANBUL, Turkey — The interior ministry offered Sunday to put up 11,000 people, a fraction of those left homeless in Turkey's devastating quakes, in state summer camps throughout the country.

The official death toll in the Nov. 12 quake reached 710 Sunday, with more than 5,100 people injured, the government said.

The toll was expected to rise further as people report dead relatives they had buried quickly after the quake.

In Kaynasli, a town of 7,000, only 12 buildings were undamaged.

Some 200,000 people who either lost their homes or are afraid to return to housing were sleeping outside in the bitter cold nine days after the 7.2-magnitude quake hit Bolu province, which is still rocked by aftershocks.

Many of the tents sheltering them are not waterproof, and some people are living under flimsy sheets of plastic.

The Nov. 12 quake was the second strong temblor to hit Turkey in less than three months. More than 17,000 people died in August when a quake struck Turkey's industrial heartland, just west of Bolu province.

Boeing contract talks stall, might resume in December

WICHITA — Contract talks between Boeing Wichita and engineering representatives have stalled and might not resume until the end of the month, union officials said Saturday.

But Dick Ziegler, spokesman for Boeing Wichita, disagreed with the word "stalled."

"Obviously, there's some sticking points that we need to resolve," he said.

The contract with the Society of Professional Engineering Employees in Aerospace covers about 1,300 engineers in Wichita.

Union leaders said key company officials would not be available to discuss pay until the end of the month.

That means it is likely that a vote on the contract will be delayed beyond Dec. 1, said Charles Bofferding, SPEEA's executive director. The current contract expires Dec. 5.

Besides pay, other issues include benefits and a new job classification system for engineers, the union has said.

The Wichita talks are separate from negotiations in Seattle between the Boeing Co. and SPEEA earlier this month. Union leaders there are recommending that professional and technical workers in the Pacific Northwest vote against the company's "last and final offer" of a four-year contract.

That offer requires workers, for the first time, to contribute toward their health benefits and it strips medical benefits for early retirees and allows the company to mandate weekend work without overtime pay, the union said.

Serious reported crime falls 10 percent in 1st half of '99

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The number of serious crimes reported to police plunged by 10 percent in the first half of this year, an unusually large drop that extended the nationwide crime decline to 7 1/2 years, the FBI said Sunday.

Led by drops of 13 percent in murders, 14 percent in burglaries and 12 percent in auto thefts, the preliminary FBI report surprised experts. The overall crime figure declined by only 5 percent, 4 percent and 3 percent in the preceding three first-half-year reports.

This year, among other violent crimes, robbery dropped 10 percent; rape, 8 percent; and aggravated assault, 7 percent.

In other property crime, larceny-theft declined 8 percent. Nationally, the report gives only percentage changes between the first six months of 1999 and of 1998.

"These drops are enormous and encouraging," said Carnegie Mellon University professor Alfred Blumstein.

"This is astounding," said James Alan Fox, a professor of criminal justice at Northeastern University. "No one could have predicted the drops would have been this deep."

As for explanations, experts cited a series of federal, state and local anti-crime measures, a growing economy, the aging of baby boomers and the decline of crack cocaine markets.

Clinton asks well-off nations to provide for poor countries

FLORENCE, Italy — President Clinton, worrying about people and places that are completely left behind, called on prosperous nations Sunday to spread global wealth by helping poor countries with Internet hookups, cell phones, debt relief and small loans.

"How can we continue to grow the economy?" Clinton asked. "You can bring investment to the places that are left behind."

In a spectacular 14th century Renaissance palace with frescoed ceilings, Clinton spoke at a "Third Way" gabfest with five like-minded world leaders. They talked for hours about how to spread the benefits of the 21st century's global economy and technological marvels.

The Third Way is billed as a middle ground between the politics of the left and the right — a system of governance that promotes entrepreneurs and trade and protects the less fortunate. Joining Clinton were Italian Premier Massimo D'Alema, British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Brazilian President Fernando Henrique Cardoso, French Prime Minister Lionel Jospin and German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder.

K-State Legal Services assists students who need legal advice

■ Campus attorney provides advice, represents students in need of low-cost lawyer.

BY TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students needing legal advice don't need to look farther than Manhattan.

Dianne Urban, K-State's attorney who represents and counsels students, said she understands how expensive attorneys can be.

"I like what I do because most students wouldn't have anyone to represent them because they couldn't afford an attorney," Urban said. "There is no justice if only people with money can go to court."

■ MORE INFO? Legal Services for Students is located in the Office of Student Activities and Services in the K-State Student Union. More information at www.ksu.edu/legal/.

Urban has been representing and counseling at K-State Legal Services for Students since 1983, handling about five to six cases per year.

Although she is limited to handling misdemeanors with no jail time, she keeps busy negotiating for students, she said. Landlord and tenant disputes are a never-ending problem.

"I'm not happy with the housing for students in this town," she said. "Overall, it's pretty decent. But there are some really bad places out there."

A portfolio of photographs buried deep in a file cabinet next to her desk spoke the truth about the living conditions of one of her clients. The student's apartment was an old basement with no room to walk without having to dodge the pipes suspended across the low ceiling. The fire exit was a simple window with a broken step stool beneath it. The bathroom had no doors. A sewage pipe even ran through the kitchen.

Among many other code violations, the apartment was a den of worms, Urban said.

With Urban's legal assistance, the student was able to get his security deposit back so he could move to another location. The apartment, however, remained virtually the same.

"There is little code enforcement in Manhattan," she said. "Some students don't have a clue what their rights might be."

This year has been different for the K-State attorney. The majority of her cases were not landlord disputes.

"All of the cases this year have dealt with alcohol violations," Urban said. "They must have added more police officers and increased the patrolling by the ABC, or Alcoholic Beverage Control."

Minor in possession offenses and providing alcohol to minors have been the two most common violations this year. The biggest issue is defining possession of alcohol for people charged with minor in Possession, Urban said.

Many times, the student was not drinking the alcohol, but still was cited for an Minor in Possession. Other times, the police conducted an illegal search and found minors drinking. If that was the case, Urban said, there is a motion to suppress the evidence.

"The strength of the case depends on the facts," she said.

Despite her efforts to inform the public, few students are aware of the legal services K-State provides. International students, she said, are the least likely to seek legal advice.

Ironically, international students know more about Legal Services for Students than domestic students do, she said. Through orientation for international students, Urban is able to inform them of the services that are available to them.

Although Urban does not represent organizations, she still is able to give talks and presentations to groups, mostly concerning alcohol.

"It's really hard to reach people," she said. "We're the best deal in town, unless you can get a friend to do it for free."

Alumni, members rededicate DU fraternity house

BY SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Forty years after the original groundbreaking of the Delta Upsilon fraternity house, alumni and active members met Saturday morning to rededicate the $1.5 million renovations.

"Why we have put so much time into this is because of continuity," said John Eplee, president of DU Alumni Corporation.

"We all have a common bond," he said. "We've all spent one to four years in this structure. We all think it's a lot nicer structure now."

David Fritchen, DU alumnus and project coordinator, said the renovated house will be ready to move into at the beginning of next semester. It will house 82 members, 18 more than its previous capacity, he said.

The fraternity went dry this fall while temporarily living in the former Sigma Sigma Sigma sorority house.

Fraternity members have chosen to stay alcohol-free once they move into their refinished house, Fritchen said.

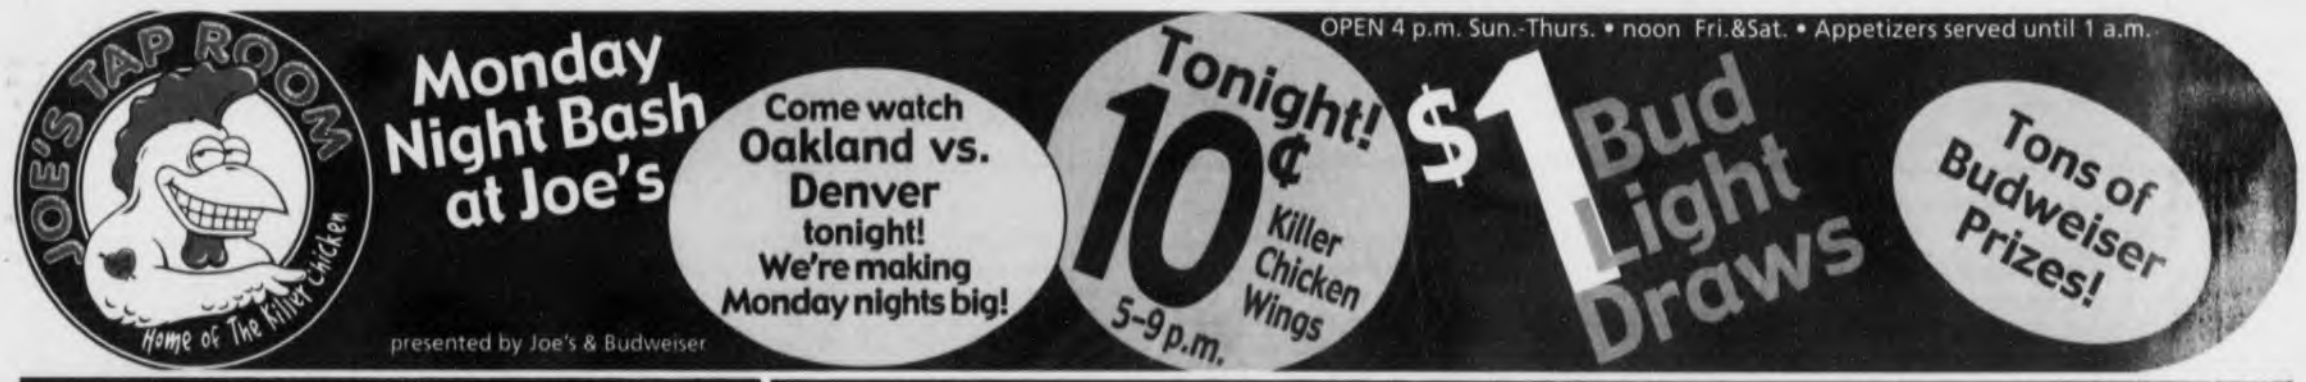
Nathan Greene, founding member of K-State's DU chapter, said the fraternity has come a long way since the house's groundbreaking in 1959.

"I was one of the original members who met out on the lawn of Anderson to discuss joining a non-secret fraternity," he said. "Until we got sufficient members and learned a little about the house, we called ourselves the 1834 Club because that's the year the fraternity was founded."

Greene said the house originally was located on Fairchild Road until the owner sold it to the phone company, forcing the men to find another residence. They then moved to a house on 14th Street before finally moving into the current house on University Drive in 1960, he said.

Kevin Combs, junior in mechanical engineering, said the new house has heightened the fraternity's spirits.

"The last year or so the morale of the house has been pretty low with having to move out and everything," he said. "Right now, the morale of the house is higher than it's ever been."



The fraternity's morale was raised even more at the dedication after receiving two more donations to help them with expenses.

Alumnus Bill Gordon announced he would donate another $25,000 to the fraternity as a Christmas present DU Nationals presented the chapter with a check for $25,000 for becoming one of their first dry chapters across the country.

Eplee thanked alumni for their support. More than 200 alumni provided some form of support to this project, he said.

Steve Holloway, DU alumnus and head architect, asked the men to take care of the house.

"I have to tell you I've been a little like an expectant father for the past four years," he said. "This is my baby. We'd like to tell the guys to enjoy themselves in this house, but take care of it."

Break offers chance to reflect, recuperate

When the Pilgrims celebrated surviving a cold, long winter by feasting and giving thanks, they probably didn't realize they were giving future college students something to be thankful for — a break.

The break Thanksgiving provides us is much needed, but that isn't the only thing Thanksgiving offers us. If used appropriately, the break and holiday can replenish our souls by giving us a chance to reflect on things and help others. In reflection, we should find so many things to be thankful for.

We have friends and families who enrich our lives and support our dreams. We should be thankful for them, and we should let them know we appreciate them.

We are thankful for the opportunity to follow our dreams. One of those dreams includes attending K-State and getting a degree.

We live in a country that allows us to speak our minds and do what we want. We should be thankful for those who came before us and spent their blood ensuring us those rights. We should be thankful for our good fortune in living here in the land of opportunity.

We should be thankful for our material possessions. We have food for our tables and clothes for our backs. But we also should consider all those who don't have half of the advantages we have. We can take the time Thanksgiving provides us and use it to help those who are less fortunate.

As college students, we have advantages too numerous to list. We truly are blessed. So, take this opportunity to say thanks to those who gave us those advantages and maybe help those who can't say the same.

Most importantly, drive carefully, enjoy Turkey Day and return safely to K-State.

Recent death in Clay County shows potential for great, bad to coexist in quiet community

ADAM HAYES/COLLEGIAN

KEN WELLS

Life crawls by in Clay County. People are born, people die and what some call "the daily grind" is a pleasant, gentle trudge through the calendar. It makes Riley County seem to be a sprawling metropolitan area. There are only a few thousand people in a few little towns. It's a beautiful place to retire.

That's what James Kenney thought.

Kenney was a 62-year-old deputy with the Clay County Sheriff's Department, brought to Clay County by its tranquility and remoteness from the chaos and violence he'd seen in Wichita, where he'd been head of the Wichita Police Department Canine Unit. Clay County's completely different; the most challenging and trying part of the day is getting a good seat and some happy-face sugar cookies at the Tasty Pastry across from the Clay County Courthouse. There are tickets to be written, the occasional traffic accident, but nothing like Wichita. None of that here.

Until Tuesday night.

Three men escaped from the Cloud County Jail, and two were found. It was a little before supper when Kenney, Clay County Sheriff Gary Caldwell, four other county officers and a Kansas Highway Patrol officer investigated the final-escaped fugitive's house in Morganville. They didn't know he was home, and Kenney and his police dog Copper went upstairs first.

Copper died first. Kenney died next.

You'd think there would be a mob, a cry for blood, a sense of outrage in Clay Center, the Clay County seat. You'd think the suspect would have been handed over to state authorities beaten to a shade of hamburger, or just in a less-than-living state. You'd think Clay Center is burning with anger and rage.

No.

Right now, there's still emptiness. There is so much empty space in just one empty chair, a chair that used to be filled with 62 years of life. Even as Kansas Attorney General Carla Stovall spoke at Kenney's memorial service Saturday, promising the state would pursue justice in the case of the accused, that sentiment was as tenuous and trembling as her voice at times; it's just not enough. Millions of dollars in legal costs and a lengthy trial loom on the horizon, and it feels inadequate. Even if we knew the verdict and the sentence, it doesn't erase the price already paid.

Kenney wanted to retire to the small Clay County town of Green, start a kennel, spend more time with man's best friends. This dream is gone and in its place is an American flag, folded triangularly, a symbol of a life given freely in defense of his adopted community.

I'm a cynic, and I have little reverence for institutions. My "respect" for police officers was minimal even before the Rodney King beating, an incident which made all of our fears and apprehensions about authority tangible. Do we see police as corrupt and racist, or woefully inept and comical à la Chief Wiggum? Do we know those who aspire to the badge as an affirmation of their lives, as power which they can use and abuse? Perhaps.

But for every vermin who would exploit the system from within and corrupt itself and its institution, there's a legion of men and women willing to protect and serve, to give the last ounce of themselves to their community without complaint.

Maybe Kenney thought Clay County peaceful and safe, even ordinary. Maybe he thought no extraordinary act of crime or violence would find root there during his tenure, and we know now that was not the case.

By the same token, in our society where a badge can be a bullseye, Deputy James "Monk" Kenney answered his calling. He knew intimately all the risks and responsibilities that hung heavy in the weight of a badge of a law enforcement officer. There is nothing casual or offhanded in that realization. There is nothing ordinary in the inherent possibility of death in the line of duty, but it is burned into the minds of every officer, and every officer's wife, husband, father, mother, brother, sister, daughter, son. There is nothing ordinary behind the badges we see every day. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

The state of Kansas said goodbye on Saturday, sending officers from everywhere in the state, each of whom realizes there might come a time when they are asked to give everything of themselves for the job they hold. It hammers home with the dry crack of the rifles against the crisp wintry breeze, the finality of the loss screams against us with a lone bugler playing "Taps." Kenney would tell you he was just doing his job, scratch Copper on the back of the neck, and shrug. That's all.

And it's everything in the world.

Clay County struggles back to its routine. The hurt's still there, and it will be. But right now, it's time to move on, with winter on the way. It's not the biggest place on the map, nor the most populous.

But it's capable of great darkness and personal sacrifice, uncommon horror and valor all at once. In the sleepiest of communities and people lies the potential for the best and worst in all of us.

Thanksgiving dinner provides opportunity for family to gather

REED DUNN

At my house, turkey is like birthday cake: We get one a year. And we are thankful for it.

The first round comes with Thanksgiving dinner as my Mom pulls the turkey from the oven and completes the meal with rolls, mashed potatoes, noodles, pumpkin pie and the like.

Round two: cold leftovers all afternoon and on into the night as we make sure to keep our guts full. When we just can't take it anymore, the remains are thrown in the fridge awaiting the next creation. Overnight, the juice from within the turkey forms a gel coating on its skin.

The days that follow include a conglomeration of creations incorporating the remains of Tom the Turkey. Cold turkey sandwiches. Hot turkey sandwiches. Turkey pot pie. Everything imaginable with the exception of turkeysicles. It is turkey overkill.

Each year I try to convince my Mom to buy a smaller bird. For a family of four, I think a 20-pound turkey is a bit unreasonable. She realizes what she is doing, though.

When shopping for Thanksgiving groceries, Mom never forgets the canned biscuits for turkey pot pie, the powder packet for brown gravy to smother the reheated turkey or the loaf of bread to sandwich the cold meat — all the pertinent ingredients to carry the turkey through the weekend.

Mom works hard getting everything ready. She spends the morning fixing the meal and the evening cleaning the kitchen, not having a chance to take much of a break.

She works too hard on Thanksgiving dinner, but makes up for it by not working as hard on the meals that follow. Even though my Mom gets teased about the wild and crazy casseroles she creates, I'm glad she does. The days following Thanksgiving are the true vacation and offer one of our only chances to be together as a family. This is what Thanksgiving is meant to be: not only a time for feast, but a time for family.

I remember in grade school being asked what I was thankful for. Some of the kids in my class said they were thankful for their bike or Atari. Most answered the same thing I said — family.

Even though I said I was thankful for my family, I took it for granted. I still do. I think I just knew that was the right thing to say. I understood Thanksgiving was supposed to be about family, but I didn't understand the importance of family.

Since college, I have become more understanding of how important it is to have a good relationship with parents and siblings. Thanksgiving is about the only time I reflect on how fortunate I am to have this support.

It's sad to think it takes a turkey dinner to be appreciative, but a fast-paced lifestyle keeps my family that lives four hours away further back in my mind than it should be.

I only have two days for Thanksgiving, and eight hours of the break are gone due to travel time. What is left, hopefully, will be valuable time with the family. Our family is small, yet it is not often the four of us make it together at the same time and place.

I can't image how tough it is for students who live states and countries away to spend time with their families. I guess this year I still am thankful for family, Mom's wacky turkey creations, and thankful I can spend at least a short time at home with my family.

Happy Turkey Day.

Wefald asks for help recovering items stolen on Thursday, Friday

Editor,

I would like to ask for your help in recovering some items which were stolen from our home at 100 Wilson Court on Thursday and Friday nights last week. We had a limestone Powercat bench, a limestone and glass Powercat large medallion, three twisted-copper Christmas trees with lights on them and several smaller items taken on Thursday night. On Friday, the three small Christmas trees with gold-colored decorations in round cement planters were taken. One of the planters and trees and another planter which had been broken later were recovered on campus.

If you know anything about these incidents would you please call 532-6400. Your name will be kept confidential. Or you can go to www.ksu.edu/police and click on the silent-witness program to provide confidential information that cannot be traced back to you. We would be so grateful to get these items back.

Lack of coverage by Collegian for campus event insults reader

Editor,

There are very few events that take place in Kansas which cater to minority or hip-hop culture. However, every year, K-State sponsors the largest concert and step show in the state of Kansas. On the weekend of Nov. 13, the men of Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity were host to the annual Neak Frasty.

This event brought people from all over the country together for the step show and concert headlined by Ja Rule. In my house alone, I had guests who traveled from Illinois, New Mexico and Colorado just for the weekend to be a part of the largest event hosted by black college students in Kansas. All proceeds from the event went to a scholarship fund for high school students.

I found it insulting that the Collegian was unable to get a photographer or a writer to cover the annual event. It also worries me to see the university student body becoming more and more apathetic to those who are not just like them. When any single organization can bring nearly 3,000 people together and not receive even a quarter of a column in the paper, there is a problem.

If the only way the men of Alpha Phi Alpha can get recognition for their hard work and dedication to the event is a letter to the editor, then so be it. I would like to say thank you and recognize the men of Alpha Phi Alpha for their efforts in coordinating the wonderful step show and concert in Bramlage Coliseum. Further, I would like to encourage them to do the same hard work next year.

Group of campus ministers urges voters to keep McCulloh in office

Editor,

We, a group of K-State campus ministers, encourage you to vote "no" in the upcoming recall election for our city commissioner, Karen McCulloh.

In her elected office as our city commissioner, Karen has not been guilty of misconduct, violation of the Constitution, nor abuse of her position as city commissioner. She voted her conscience as we elected her to do. It would be harmful and wrong to vote her out of office.

Some of us have known and worked with Karen and we are deeply aware of her sense of Christian compassion and justice in the work and decisions she has made on behalf of our community and people. She is a member of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, affirms the Ten Commandments and reflects those values in her community service.

We do not believe that Karen acted to further establish secular humanism, but expressed sensitivity to our society of religious pluralism. As deeply committed Christians ourselves, we see the importance of protecting our religious freedom as guaranteed in the constituting documents of the United States of America.

Students and staff who would like to vote, please register today and vote Dec. 7.

Cats conclude season at home by cruising to win over Missouri

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Finishing on a good note and going out in style.

Both could be used to describe No. 9 K-State's 66-0 blowout win over the Missouri Tigers on Saturday at KSU Stadium.

After the Wildcats' (10-1, 7-1) heartbreaking loss at Nebraska, more was on the line than just a win against the Tigers (4-7, 1-7). On Senior Day, postseason play and pride seemed to define the contest. No one wanted a carbon-copy performance of last season, when the Cats let their loss in the Big 12 Championship game affect the outcome of the Builders Square Alamo Bowl against Purdue.

"I think they went in to try to be a better football team than what we showed a week ago," head coach Bill Snyder said.

With that in mind, the Cats stormed out of the gates in the first quarter in a way that never had been seen at K-State. In a quarter that lasted nearly an hour, the Cats managed to hang 35 points on the Tigers for a new record for points scored in a single quarter. In fact, K-State's 66 points were the most ever scored on a conference opponent in history.

Defense and special teams set the tone early. On the Tigers' first possession of the game, the defense forced a three-and-out series and then put it in the hands of the punt return team, who used a 38-yard return by junior David Allen to set up the Cats' first score of the game when senior running back Frank Murphy darted 5 yards into the end zone.

The scoring barrage ensued. Junior quarterback Jonathan Beasley ran for one touchdown and then connected with junior wide receiver Quincy Morgan for another. Just when the Tigers didn't think it could get worse, K-State junior cornerback Dyshod Carter recovered a Missouri fumble in the end zone to put the Cats up 28-0. Murphy capped off the record-setting quarter

Defense makes statement with shutout victory

BY SAM STIERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's defense didn't want to experience déjà vu Saturday.

The Cats' defense was coming off its worst performance of the year against Nebraska and wanted to make a statement and send the seniors off not only with a win, but with a shutout.

"Everybody loses every once in a while, and we wanted to prove we were a team that could come back from a loss," safety Jarrod Cooper said.

Sophomore linebacker Ben Leber echoed Cooper's sentiments.

"We knew we had to play hard and show everybody we could bounce back," Leber said. "After last year's episode, we didn't want to repeat that, and we knew it would take a dominating effort to show everyone this is a different team."

A dominating effort is exactly what the defense delivered. The defense scored 12 points and shut out Missouri,

Victory sparks question: Where do Cats go now?

K-State couldn't have ended its season better.

The Wildcats recuperated from an embarrassing 41-15 defeat against Nebraska to pulverize the poor, helpless, battered, disheveled, geriatric Missouri Tigers.

Nevertheless, after watching K-State's 66-0 horsewhipping they gave the Tigers, I couldn't help but feel sick to my stomach. Heck, I even felt kind of dirty.

That wasn't a football game, that was like witnessing torture. The Wildcats battered Missouri for four straight quarters, including 35 points in the first quarter alone.

K-State forced six turnovers and held Missouri to just 43 passing yards. Pretty impressive. But perhaps the most impressive thing about the victory is that it

Men's basketball team opens season with win

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's basketball team defeated the Northwestern State Demons 76-71 Sunday at Bramlage Coliseum, but nevertheless, the Wildcats' first game of the season didn't come easy.

With a little under four minutes to go, the Cats (1-1) nearly watched an 11-point lead slip away. The Demons' (0-2) senior guard Brentt Shropshire ignited the Demon comeback when he drained a three-pointer to pull within eight. Two minutes and seven points later, K-State was staring down the pipe of near loss, until 6-foot-8-inch senior forward Tony Kitt went to the line and made one of two free throws to maintain a close advantage at 73-71.

Down the final stretch, K-State made three of four from the charity stripe to seal the win, while the Demons were held scoreless in the final minute and a half.

Kitt said he feels K-State is a lot better than what they showed against the Demons, and the margin of victory should have been larger.

"We didn't play as well as we should have," Kitt said. "We played in spurts, like little spurts at the time. I'm not going to say that we're only four or five points better than this team, but the game should have been that close."

Four Cats scored in double figures on the night. Senior forward Josh Reid led the way in scoring, but perhaps it was community college transfer Kelvin Howell who made the largest dent in the outcome with his 13 points. Howell was perfect from the field, making all five shots attempted, including three of three from the line.

"Howell played tremendous," head coach Tom Asbury said. "He was just exactly what we hoped he'd be when we recruited him."

Most of the first half was a seesaw battle between the squads as they exchanged buckets until the seven-minute mark of the half.

With the score knotted at 19, K-State started an 13-4 run that carried them into halftime leading 32-23.

Despite turning the ball over 26 times, K-State did win. This comes after the Cats dropped their opening game of the season 88-69 at No. 9 Arizona.

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/COLLEGIAN

K-State's Tony Kitt is fouled by Northwestern State's Charles Thompson from behind while Alann Polk tries to get the ball during the Wildcats' first home game of the regular season at Bramlage Coliseum on Sunday afternoon. The Wildcats went on to win the game 76-71.

"We couldn't apply the knockout punch and that's probably the most disappointing thing," Asbury said. "We get up by 10 or 12, and we do a couple of self-destructive type of things. Their defense was good, but we saw a lot out of Arizona to where we just kept shooting ourselves in the foot."

K-State's next action is at home against Texas-San Antonio on Nov. 29.

Women's squad squeaks out victory in 1st game of season

■ Cats win by 2 in front of 3rd-largest crowd ever.

BY SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team won its home opener 59-57 over Drake in front of the third-largest crowd in school history.

The Cats and Bulldogs played it close, with the largest lead of nine points coming midway through the second half. Sophomore Kristin Rethman and senior Nicky Ramage scored back-to-back before halftime to put the Cats up 26-22.

The Cats maintained that lead with three-point shooting from Rethman, who shot five of six beyond the arch and led the team in scoring with 19 points. Rethman, however, did come off the bench and said that doing so sometimes provides an advantage.

"You can see what the other team is doing and be able to make changes," Rethman said. "My teammates were doing a great job of screening and getting the ball to me when I was open and ready. I was able to contribute and help the team so it felt good."

The Cats shot 38 percent from the floor but connected on only three of 11 free throws. The Bulldogs shot 40 percent from the floor but only 28.6 percent from three-point range, compared to the Cats' 38 percent.

"I think it proves that we've really got some fight and we've got some character that is going to serve us well," head coach Deb Patterson said. "I think this was an extremely challenging game for us to open with, as it was for Drake, and I just have so much respect for that ball team. They are intelligent, aggressive, and they never stop playing in the game.

"We're still a long way away offensively from being comfortable and really maximizing each

Close contact indoors spreads flu, cold

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is inevitable.

Soon, cold and flu season will be upon K-State students, and Lafene Health Center will be abuzz with activity, treating symptoms and trying to prevent an epidemic.

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene, said so far this year there has been only one unconfirmed case of the flu. She said the warm weather might have prevented it thus far, but it has not stopped it completely.

"The weather may have delayed it, but has not stopped it from coming," Kennedy said. "Last year at this time, we were very busy treating students with flu-like symptoms. I wouldn't be surprised if we start seeing that again in the near future."

George Marchin, associate professor of microbiology, said that when the weather is warm, people tend to stay outside and away from close quarters. Once the weather turns cold, however, people will turn to the indoors.

"Typically, once the weather turns bad, people will come in contact with each other in close quarters," Marchin said. "With all those people inside together, germs will be spread more easily."

Kennedy said the best advice for students is to do what mothers have always said — wash your hands. She said washing hands with hot water and soap is the best way to begin the prevention of spreading germs from person to person.

"When you cough and then touch items, another person can come by, touch that item and then touch their mouth — thus spreading germs," Kennedy said. "There is no guarantee that washing your hands will prevent you from getting sick, but it is the easiest, most efficient way."

Common cold symptoms can include a sore throat, sneezing, stuffy nose, watery eyes, achiness and a general tired feeling. However, Marchin said symptoms are not due to the actual virus, but are produced by the immune system as it attacks the virus.

He said by attempting to remain healthy, eating properly and getting plenty of rest, avoiding a cold virus can be possible.

"It is very important for students to manage their time in a way so that they can get enough sleep at night," Marchin said. "I know it is difficult for college students to get the required amount of sleep with extracurricular activities and tests, but to avoid the cold, it is necessary."

Kennedy said she also agreed sleep was an essential element to remaining healthy during the winter months. She said students are under enough stress without adding an illness on top of a normal routine.

"Getting enough rest is very important," Kennedy said. "Students try to catch up on the weekends, but that is not ideal. It doesn't really substitute for a good night's sleep."

Kennedy said the flu is difficult to avoid, but getting a flu shot helps. She said it is important to get a flu shot every year because the virus can mutate from one season to the next. This year, the flu shot protects against three different strains.

She said, however, that if a person comes into contact with a fourth strain, the shot will not necessarily aid in preventing the illness, although the antibodies will help in preventing a bad case. Lafene already has given about 1,300 flu shots this year.

"Most students are generally in good health," Kennedy said. "However, if you take them away from classes, it is just adding to the stress. It is better to avoid getting sick altogether."

MORE INFO?
If you want a flu shot or think you have symptoms of the cold or the flu, contact Lafene at 532-6544.

Flu symptoms can include fever, chills, headaches, muscle and joint aches and a general sick feeling. Marchin said the flu generally affects the older population more severely, with mortality rates rising during flu season because it is a respiratory disease that starts in the throat and nasal passages. It can then travel down into the lungs and develop into pneumonia. In healthy people this does not happen, but in some cases, the flu can be lethal.

"College students are reasonably healthy," Marchin said. "Students who live in close quarters are going to be more susceptible, so a cheap and effective way to prevent getting sick is to get a flu shot."

Marchin said remedies can include vitamin C, and he said studies have shown that zinc lozenges can be affective in reducing symptoms. A more common and well-known remedy, he said, is a bowl of chicken noodle soup.

"Any kind of warm broth can help when you are sick," Marchin said. "It has been shown that the broth stimulates nasal secretions, so there might be some science to it. It also just makes you feel good."

Course teaches teens baby-sitting skills, responsibilities involved with child care

BY LAUREN BEATTY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mary Olsen wants to be a super sitter.

That's why she's taking the Super Sitter course on how to baby-sit at Mercy Health Center.

Registered nurse Janet Kiser has been teaching the class for 15 years. She said she started it as a 4-H project, and when she began working for Mercy Health Center five years ago she brought the class with her.

The course is aimed at 11- to 15-year-olds.

"We did say fourth grade and up, but we got some kids that were just too young. Most parents want someone a little bit older to baby-sit," Kiser said.

This session, there are 15 participants. They attend three two-hour sessions and learn a variety of skills to use when baby-sitting.

Kiser said the class goes through a booklet of activities and sometimes will have a little bit of homework.

Each of the activities focuses on an aspect of good baby-sitting. The activities include learning a baby-sitters' rights and responsibilities, what to do when a child is crying and children's safety.

"Safety is the most important thing in baby-sitting. So the main meaning of the course is safety. We teach accident prevention and personal safety," Kiser said.

Kiser said some other focuses of the class have to do with age-appropriate activities.

"We do something called 'ages and stages.' It deals with what children do and how they react at each stage in their life," Kiser said.

The participants also watch videos on safe baby-sitting and do hands-on activities. One activity is diapering and feeding a doll correctly. Kiser said she also does an activity where she puts several toys on the table, and the students describe which are safe toys and which are unsafe.

The students said they took the class for many reasons, mostly because of the influence of their parents or older siblings.

"My sister baby-sits a lot and when she doesn't want to, it would be nice to fill in and get some money," said Olsen, an 11-year-old student at Frank Bergman Elementary School.

"My mom said people would feel better when I was baby-sitting if I took the class," said Jessica Rogers, a 12-year-old student at Dwight D. Eisenhower Middle School.

At the end of the course, Kiser said the students take a final exam. If they pass, they will receive a certificate of completion to show to prospective employers. If they miss more than five questions on the test, they must retake the course.

Racial slurs, threats left on walls of high school

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NICKERSON, Kan. — Security will be tightened at Nickerson High School today after the discovery of several racial epithets and threats in bathrooms at the school.

The writer used a black marker Friday to write "NNAN" in three boys' bathrooms. Nickerson Police Chief Tom Burns said that stands for "No Niggers at Nickerson."

In each case, the graffiti also included threats, such as "Gonna rock this school no survivors" and "It's going to happen Monday," Burns said Saturday.

All three messages appeared to be the work of the same writer, Burns said. Some were written in letters 6 to 8 inches tall, others were the size of normal handwriting.

"It wasn't just some kid who went to the bathroom and had nothing else to do," Burns said.

Because of the threats, two Nickerson police officers will be on duty at the school today. School officials will search book bags for weapons and closely watch students.

Principal Kevin Abbott said he had no indications of racial tension at the school. Two black students attend the high school, which has an enrollment of 480.

GAMER

with yet another score, this one from 7 yards out.

"Everything seemed to fall in place," Snyder said of the total-team performance. "Things just don't happen, or at least that's my feeling. You have to make them happen, and I thought our players did."

Snyder said the only aspect of the game he was concerned about at halftime was the number of penalties his team had. Other than that, K-State's 42-0 lead was acceptable.

"There wasn't anything at halftime that I was overly disappointed in other than the two penalties that concerned me," Snyder said. "We had a touchdown called back because of a penalty, and we had a long punt return called back because of a penalty, but outside of that I thought we played real well."

Offensive coordinator and quarterbacks coach Ron Hudson attributed the strong first quarter opening to the return of Beasley and Murphy. Until this past week's practices, Beasley hadn't worked with the offense in practice because of a shoulder injury he suffered prior to the Baylor contest Oct. 30. As for Murphy, he's made returns against Colorado and Nebraska but still had experienced substantial pain in both contests.

"I think you saw the Kansas State offense," Hudson said. "I think it was an offense with a fresh Frank Murphy and a healthy Jonathan Beasley. And the ability to be able to utilize those two people can open up a lot of different avenues, and that's what happened because we can throw it as well as running it."

In just a quarter and a half, Beasley completed five of seven passes for 173 yards and two touchdowns, while Murphy ran 15 times for 37 yards, including his two scores.

K-State's defense played what could be its best game of the season. The nation's No. 4 total defensive unit held the Tigers to just 116 total yards while stripping them of the ball an additional six times. DeRon Tyler, Terence Newman and Carter all had interceptions in the game. The defense also teamed up to sack the Missouri quarterbacks, both Jim Dougherty and Justin Gage, six times combined. Considering both quarterbacks were pressured heavily throughout the game, they managed to complete just five of 23 passes combined.

Snyder said the game gets difficult to coach when his team's lead becomes so outrageous, but at all times he wants to respect the opposition and try to refrain from running the score up.

"You just call running plays and hope that you can get a first down from time to time, so that you're just not continually putting your defense back on the field," Snyder said.

"The players are out there are going to play hard. I expect them to play hard, and I expect them to try to succeed at every snap that they have, because Missouri's kids are still going to compete. They're still scrapping. You want it to end the right way and the right way is to play as hard as you can, and yet not try to embarrass yourself."

K-State's lone shot at the conference championship lies in the outcome of the Nebraska/Colorado matchup Friday. Even with much football left to be played, the bowl gossip has begun — which bowl will K-State attend and which would Snyder prefer.

"I don't have a particular thought one way or another," Snyder said. "I don't have a preference. The bowl games that we have been to have treated us extremely well and have been very gracious and we've enjoyed each and every one of them.

"Do I have a favorite? No. We lost the one I wanted to play in last week."

played here," Simoneau said. "That was a great victory.

"We got a shutout, and being a defensive player, that's very important to me.

"After last week's disappointment at Nebraska, to come back this way and show great character, it's a great way to finish my career."

Running back Frank Murphy, who scored two touchdowns in his final home game, said despite that he spent much of his time at K-State sidelined with injuries, he has no regrets.

"I was discouraged somewhat," Murphy said. "But I wouldn't want it any other way. I'm glad I came here, that's my choice, and I'm happy with the way it ended. I got two touchdowns, and I just want to thank God for what I've got."

He and coach Bill Snyder said it's difficult to balance emotions and game-time focus, but the seniors this year did it well.

"It is an extremely emotional time," Snyder said. "They've been here by and large for an extended period of time, and they understand what all of this means to them.

"Yet at the same time you've got to be able to enjoy that moment when all the hoopla's going on and the emotion tends to rush very quickly and very strongly and enjoy that, and then be able to step away from it and get your mind focused back on the ball game so you don't ruin that moment — and I thought our seniors did."

The Cats part with a large portion of the defensive nucleus this year in Simoneau, defensive end Darren Howard, linebacker Travis Litton and safety Lamar Chapman. Defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said the defense came out fired up for the seniors.

"We talked all week about these guys — they'd lost one home game in five years," Bennett said. "When you look at the guys we had on defense, it was a good thing.

"I knew it was going to be a good day when I saw (Jarrod) Cooper serious and he really wanted Lamar to win."

Cooper said he learned a great deal from the seniors and had mixed feelings throughout the game.

"Everything on the field with me and football is created by those guys on the field, so I don't know what it's going to be like without them," Cooper said. "During the game it was fun and sad at the same time, because I was happy and cheering on Mark and Darren, and at the same time thinking about how it was the last time."

could have been much worse. The Wildcats played the entire second half using almost all reserves, including third-string quarterback Jeremy Milne.

If there was any suspicion K-State was going to feel sorry for itself losing in Lincoln, Neb. all the suspicion was left in Lincoln. The recharged Cats took the challenge and proved to the world via a 66-0 thrashing that they are still a fine football team.

As the regular season comes to an abrupt halt, a question rears its ugly head: Where does K-State go now? Nokia Sugar Bowl? Doubt it. Builders Square Alamo Bowl? Hope not. Big 12 Championship game? Yeah, that might happen.

In order for the Wildcats to play in their second consecutive Big 12 title game, Colorado has to beat Nebraska next weekend in Boulder. The scenario doesn't sound too likely, but it might be K-State's only hope to snag an Alliance Bowl bid.

If Colorado miraculously beats the Huskers and K-State beats Texas for the second time in the season, K-State's strength of schedule ranking would launch the team into an Alliance bid. That could put K-State into a happy-go-lucky Tostitos Fiesta Bowl. Sound unlikely? Stranger things have happened.

An even weirder scenario might be in the works. Let's say, just for the sake of argument, that the Wildcats play in San Antonio and beat Texas. Also, let's say that Boston College knocks off Virginia Tech, giving it its first loss. That scenario might be enough to push K-State in contention for a matchup against Florida State in the Sugar Bowl.

Maybe I'm pushing it. But anything could happen. College football is unpredictable, and anyone could beat anyone.

However, both of these scenarios stem off the unlikely chance that Nebraska loses in Boulder.

Head coach Bill Snyder remains optimistic and has his team preparing for the best.

"If Nebraska loses, we have to be prepared," he said. "There are still glimmers of hope that something positive can happen."

So it's obvious. The best chance for K-State to end up with an Alliance Bowl bid is if Nebraska loses.

Here are five things that need to happen for that scenario to come true:

1. Mike Moschetti must have a big game. Nebraska's defense is good, but they are susceptible to the long pass. Moschetti can throw the long pass. If Moschetti hooks up with Javon Green like they did in Manhattan two weeks ago, Colorado is victorious.

2. Colorado's defense is improving every game. They must make Eric Crouch look like a kindergartner. If they don't? Nebraska wins big.

As the regular season comes to an abrupt halt, a question rears its ugly head: Where does K-State go now? Sugar Bowl? Doubt it. Alamo Bowl? Hope not.

3. Colorado must kick away from punt return specialists Bobby Newcombe and Joe Walker. Nebraska must punt the ball to Colorado's dangerous return man Ben Kelly.

4. A lone K-State fan must turn Ralphie the Buffalo loose. Ralphie charges in a murderous rampage and pops Nebraska mascot Lil' Red. Lil' Red is deflated and so are the Huskers' hopes and dreams.

5. Last, Husker tackle Steve Warren heads to Taco Bell before the game. Unfortunately, he does not receive the chalupa he ordered. I think you know what happens next. Warren kidnaps the Taco Bell Chihuahua, and Nebraska is forced to forfeit.

Hey, it could happen. This weird season of college football is proof in the pudding. Anything could happen.

holding them to 1.8 yards per play.

The Cats also sacked Missouri quarterbacks six times and held the Tigers to two for 16 on third-down conversions.

Defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said he knew the defense was ready to play.

"These kids told me, 'Coach, we're the No. 1 secondary and we're not giving up anything,'" Bennett said. "I knew it was going to be a good day when I saw Cooper serious, and he wanted Lamar (Chapman) to win. That was a good sign."

K-State came into the game as the nation's No. 1 pass defense and continued its dominance against the Tigers.

Junior cornerback Dyshod Carter said he had never been part of a more dominating performance.

"We came to win one for the seniors and play as hard as we can," Carter said.

The entire defense played well, but it was the future Wildcat stars who created the excitement. Of the defense's six forced turnovers, five were by underclassmen. Freshman defensive backs Terence Newman and DeRon Tyler each had an interception, and Carter scored twice on defense.

Cooper said the young players have a lot of talent, and even with the loss of several very talented seniors, the defense is in good hands.

"That's what's coming up," Cooper said. "Those guys are good. We're not losing anything at all."

possession and knowing what we need to look for and have the confidence to get it there and go with that look."

Point guard April Sailors struggled, hitting one of nine from three-point range and two of 15 total for five points and three assists.

"It wasn't that great, but we had four of our teammates where if something bad happened at the top, they would fight back," Sailors said. "I give a lot of credit to my teammates. Everybody fought all five of us, and I didn't play the greatest but my teammates were there."

Senior Jenny Coalson led the Cats in assists with six and added seven rebounds, while centers Angie Finkes and Ramage grabbed 10 boards each and combined for 27 points.

"I just wanted to win like everybody else," Ramage said. "We just went in there, our rebounding needs some improvement, but all in all the posts wanted to get in there and take some shots and get some rebounds and play hard."

Center Olga Firsova was kept ineffective most of the game, playing 11 minutes, but Finkes and Ramage kept the Bulldogs' inside threat Tammi Blackstone to 4 points.

"I think this was a big challenge for us to see what we were made of and how we were going to play," Ramage said. "I think we proved it. I think we came out and played hard and played 40 minutes."

The Cats travel to the Cancún Tournament that takes place Tuesday through Sunday, where they will face Alabama and NC State.

Speaker stresses need to establish honor codes

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A professor at Rutgers University said issues concerning honor and academic codes on campuses are serious.

Don McCabe, professor of organizational management at Rutgers University, spoke during a provost lecture Friday, "Examining the New Honor Code." He said universities need to establish a code of ethics for students, and should create an intense atmosphere of learning when freshmen arrive on campus.

"Colleges have the opportunity to show students that learning really starts in college," McCabe said. "We need to show that we are serious about cheating, and when they sit in the classroom and observe that cheating is obviously going on, they look at it and say that it really is like high school."

K-State Provost Jim Coffman said in the past five years, the university has worked to establish a system for dealing with cheating.

"In 1994, we had an incidence of cheating," Coffman said. "To the university's credit, we came together to take a specific and sustained force on the issue."

"Colleges have the opportunity to show students that learning really starts in college."

— Don McCabe, professor of organizational management at Rutgers University

Coffman said K-State now has a system in place.

"It took five years to get to the system we have now," Coffman said. "This never would have happened if student leadership in successive administrations had not stayed to the plate and kept working on the issue."

McCabe has been researching the topic of cheating and honor codes for a good deal of his professional career, and he uses data going back 30 years. He has begun to include K-State in his recent surveys.

"The data from K-State ranges from being complimentary to areas of minor concern," McCabe said.

In his research, McCabe said he has found the topic of cheating has two differing opinions on campuses.

"Cheating really has two different worlds on every campus," McCabe said, "people who think that cheating is widespread and people who think that it doesn't exist."

He said his research has found that teachers and students have differing opinions on cheating and what is serious cheating.

McCabe also said if the disciplinary action taken against cheating is not severe, then the number of people cheating will increase.

Through his research, McCabe said the gap between the number of men and women cheating is beginning to even out.

Audience members said they found the speech insightful.

Susan Gormely, health professional adviser in the College of Arts and Sciences, said she thinks it is sad that cheating is such a big problem.

"I enjoyed the lecture, but I think it is a shame that we have to have a lecture comparing problems of cheating," Gormely said.

"I certainly am in favor of an honor code."

Launch pushes China closer to manned space mission

BY RENEE SCHOOF
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEIJING — China is one step closer to catching up to the U.S. and Russian space programs after conducting its first unmanned test of a spacecraft designed to carry astronauts.

The spacecraft Shenzhou safely touched down on land in north China's Inner Mongolia early Sunday after 21 hours orbiting Earth.

Western experts say after this accomplishment — a breakthrough for the nation's secretive space program — China will probably send its first manned mission into space next year.

While the most recent flight was unmanned, the Shenzhou (pronounced shun-jo) is capable of carrying astronauts, who are dubbed "taikonauts" in Beijing, from the Chinese word for space.

"This looks to have been an excellent start to the Chinese manned space program and puts them on a course for a manned flight in about a year's time," said Phillip Clark, a British expert on the Chinese program.

He predicted a manned flight sometime in October to December of next year, if no problems arise.

The state-run Xinhua News Agency said more unmanned tests were planned before a manned flight, but gave no timetable. China did not announce Sunday's flight until after the craft had landed.

The spacecraft was adapted by Chinese scientists from the design of the Russian Soyuz craft, but it is heavier, has four solar panels compared with two, and has a forward module that is cylindrical instead of spherical, Clark said.

China also turned to Russia for the craft's life-support system and for astronaut training, he said.

As early as 2001 or 2002, the nation is likely to put into orbit a small lab that future crews can visit, Clark said. Chinese experts also have discussed a new family of modular launch vehicles, including a large one that would likely be for a moon landing, possibly in 10 or 20 years, he said.

According to Clark, the test flight over the weekend was originally scheduled for last fall, and the first manned flight for this October, around the time of the 50th anniversary of communist rule on Oct. 1.

China conducted its first unmanned test of a spacecraft designed to carry astronauts, which orbited Earth for 21 hours. A manned flight is predicted to launch sometime in October to December of next year if no problems arise.

But development problems with the new Long March 2F rocket caused a year-long delay.

Although China's space program has been highly secretive, Western observers knew a test launch was imminent when China deployed four space-tracking ships at sea, Clark said.

James Oberg, a 22-year veteran of the U.S. space shuttle program who now works as an independent consultant, said U.S. space command officials also tracked the latest launch, flight and landing.

"This basically is proof they have attained a very exclusive level of space capability," he said.

The Shenzhou, which means "magic vessel" but whose characters sound the same as a name for China, was launched from the Jiuquan center in northwest China's Gansu province on Saturday, the state media reported.

President Jiang Zemin approved the manned space program, named Project 921, in 1992. China launched its first satellite in 1970.

The program is a source of pride for the largely rural nation, where average incomes hover at only $260 per year.

An unidentified official in charge of the manned flight project was quoted by the Chinese media as saying it would "strengthen the country's comprehensive national strength, promote the development of science and technology, enhance national prestige (and) boost the nation's sense of pride and cohesiveness."

In addition to boosting national pride, China expects practical results from its space mission.

Chinese military officers have written about the need to improve satellite communications and to develop space-based weapons.

Bench, Powercat stolen from president's yard

BY LESLIE ELSASSER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Several granite items were stolen from President Jon Wefald's yard early Thursday and Friday mornings.

Wefald said that sometime between 3:30 and 4:30 a.m. Thursday a granite bench and a granite Powercat stone the size of a basketball were taken from the backyard. About the same time Friday morning, three or four granite flower planters were taken from the front yard.

Wefald said there were not any suspects, but he said he thinks more than one person was involved because of the weight of the items taken. He said the bench weighs about 300 pounds, and the planters weigh 40-50 pounds each.

"They cleaned us out in the back and in the front," he said. "It isn't much fun, and it's disappointing."

Wefald said he thinks the same people were involved both nights because the same types of items were taken each night.

He said he hopes anyone with information about the theft will report it to the K-State Police.

"They're not the kinds of things to put in a closet or living room, so somebody would have to see them somewhere," Wefald said.

The bench is worth $300, and the planters are priceless because they've been at the house for 50 years, Wefald said. He said he is disappointed this happened and hopes people don't try to break into the house next.

"We've been here since 1986 and have never had anything happen like this," he said.

K-State officials could not be reached for comment.

Mourners gather for service to remember A&M students

BY MIKE CRISSEY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLLEGE STATION, Texas — Classmates, families and friends gathered in churches Sunday, quietly sobbing and praying for the 12 people killed when a four-story pyramid of logs collapsed at Texas A&M University.

A somber Gov. George W. Bush attended a memorial service at the Central Baptist Church near the campus and signed the guest books of all 12 victims.

"I'm here to help the Aggie family from what has been a tragic situation in the state of Texas," Bush told reporters. He did not plan to speak at the service. "It is a time to pray and a time to hear the word."

Earlier Sunday, a youth minister at A&M United Methodist Church recited the names of the dead, and 12 small white candles were lighted for the victims. Tim Kerlee Jr., who often attended the church, was one of those killed in the collapse.

The Aggie spirit is strong, senior pastor Charles Anderson told the congregation — but "the spirit of Aggieland is not enough."

Local, state and federal officials planned to meet today to map out an investigation strategy. But Anderson said the answers would do little to comfort those left behind.

"Answers won't hold your hand," he said. "Answers won't hold you in their arms, and answers will not sit by your bedside on a sleepless night."

Three of the victims were buried Sunday. Jamie Hand, 19, an environmental-design major and artist who sang at her church, was buried near her home in Henderson.

A busload of Aggies attended the funeral, several of whom gathered in front of her casket to sing the "Aggie War Hymn."

Seven people remained hospitalized Sunday, two in critical condition.

Officials have said about 70 people were stacking the 40-foot pyramid of logs for the annual football game bonfire when the pile gave way early Thursday.

Some students were hurled from the structure; others were trapped in the shifting logs.

Artists gather to greet new owners of art gallery

BY JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Julie Strecker's 20 years as the owner of Manhattan's only commercial art gallery culminated in a special anniversary reception Friday night that drew more than 300 artists and collectors.

The event, Strecker's last as the sole operator of the Strecker Gallery and Design Studio at 332 Poyntz Ave., not only allowed those in attendance to celebrate her contributions to local artists in the years leading to her retirement, but allowed guests to greet new gallery owners Jay and Barbara Nelson.

"One could barely move because of the people there," said Jim Munce, a Strecker Gallery artist.

The sale of the gallery came about when Strecker announced earlier this year that she was interested in retiring in order to spend more time with her family as well as focus on her other business venture, Geometrics, an interior design store located just down the street from the Strecker Gallery.

"I let it be known that I was interested in selling, and Jay approached me," Strecker said. "He has a real passion for art."

Barbara Nelson said it was a complete surprise when her husband returned home one evening with the news that they were now the proud owners of an art gallery.

"When he came home with this weird idea, I thought, 'Wow, this is going to be fun,'" Nelson said.

Jay Nelson said what he liked best about the gallery was the fact that it is the only of its kind in Manhattan.

"This place works as a cultural center as well as a commercial enterprise," he said. "You can fall in love with a piece and actually take it home."

Few changes will take place with the change of command at the gallery, which will be known as the Strecker-Nelson, the Nelsons said. Gallery manager Deborah Burtnett will remain on staff to aid in sales, as well as to continue her work as the gallery's conservation framer. Jay Nelson said he will also continue Strecker's connections with the gallery's contributors, retaining all artists that have displayed at the Strecker Art Gallery in the past.

"We're going to keep all the artists she has and gain more," he said. "Our job really is to represent the artists and free them up to make art. That's why they have a dealer."

Strecker also will remain a part of gallery operations, and will act as an adviser for the Nelsons. However, she said her help would not be necessary.

"I'll always be available, but they won't need me. They'll be fine," she said. "It's definitely going to be a smooth transition."

While the Nelsons prepare to take over ownership, which will become effective Jan. 1, Strecker said she is looking forward to some downtime with her grandchildren.

However, she will continue to be a staple of Manhattan's art world when she takes her business online next month.

The site, www.streckerfinearts.com, will feature the work of many of the gallery's artists, as well as Geometrics merchandise.

Strecker said the Nelsons have a lot to look forward to as Manhattan's newest gallery owners.

"The best part of the job is matching art to the collector," she said. "My biggest thrill is selling someone their first piece of art. I've changed someone's life when I've done that."

The gallery's first event under the Strecker-Nelson name will take place on Jan. 28, when the mixed-media works of Stephanie Muños-O'Neil will be available for sale. Jay Nelson said he would encourage all those interested to attend the exhibit's opening, or just to drop by the gallery during regular business hours.

"Browsers are always welcome, and I love to talk art," he said.

New Counting Crows album entices with familiar sounds

BY EVAN SEMON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Releasing three albums in a decade is not an uncommon thing to do, but there is a slight risk involved in doing so.

That risk is the danger of sounding repetitive.

Music Review
OUT OF 5
Counting Crows
"This Desert Life"

Perhaps it's unfair to demand that a group's sound and style modulate or evolve to keep listeners on their toes, to expect the unexpected.

Perhaps if the sound were enticing enough, it would never become repetitive in the first place.

Counting Crows certainly is not fading from the music scene, but its new CD, "This Desert Life," although new material, tends to be singing the same tune.

As a frustrated Adam Duritz said earlier this month when performing songs off the new album, "This song is about, well, they're all about the same thing." With that statement, Duritz captured the group's biggest strength and weakness.

When you get beyond the ex-girlfriend-inspired lyrics, (apparently the same girls: Elizabeth, Maria and Anna) you will find some pretty impressive musical artistry. "Hanginaround," the album's first single and its intro, combines subtle harmonies during the chorus and live, recorded-in-stereo clapping.

This uplifting music is followed by another up-tempo track, "Mrs. Potter's Lullaby," but this is short-lived, and you return home to where you are used to Counting Crows being: Home — a sullen, dreary place, where you suddenly begin to feel lonely again.

"Amy Hit the Atmosphere" is a piano-led track that gives you lyrics like, "Any time it rains, she just feel a lot better." Backed by subtle guitars and harmonies, it's a welcome return to Duritz working lost- girlfriend characters into his music.

Duritz has written songs that anyone who has had a heart broken in the past (or who has broken a heart now) can relate to. This seems to be one of the most common ways Duritz is able to connect with his audience.

Ben Mize, the drummer for the band, provides an energetic beat to "Four Days" which sets a nice launching pad into "All My Friends," the best group effort on the album. "Colorblind," a solo effort, will win for best song, thanks to Duritz's melodic running piano line and abstract lyrics. "Colorblind" is somewhat reminiscent of "Raining in Baltimore," a song that appeared on "August and Everything After."

The other band members include lead guitarist Dan Vickrey, bassist Matt Malley, organ player Charles Gilingham and rhythm guitarist David Bryson.

Following the lead of past "character songs" like "Anna Begins" and "Goodnight Elizabeth," "St. Robinson in His Cadillac Dream" introduces Arthur Robinson to the cast of players in Duritz's universe. This song speaks of what Duritz sees as the obstacles that lie between him and happiness.

That pretty much describes the entire mood of the album: his ongoing struggle to win, and his wallowing in the romanticism of always losing.

Hope springs eternal. But most times, "comet"-sized obstacles will come between you and what you desire.

Successful musicians like Counting Crows all are faced with a constant game of "Can you top this?" The competitor? Themselves.

Time will be the judge of whether "This Desert Life" will live up to the standards set by the first two albums or die in their shadows.

"The most important thing about this band is heart. That's where the songs come from — that's what I'd most want people to understand. What sounds good and looks good, that's nothing. The only worthwhile thing in art is seeing someone else's heart," Duritz said.

If you would like to catch a glimpse of his heart, Counting Crows will be visiting Kansas City, Mo., on Nov. 30 at Memorial Hall.

Tickets are available through Ticketmaster.

Joining WTO mixed blessing for China's workers

By JOHN LEICESTER
The Associated Press

BEIJING — Beside the cheery, ruddy-cheeked farmers selling baskets of bright orange persimmons, carpenter Chan Yinmiao cut a forlorn figure sitting by the side of the road on a Beijing overpass, waiting in the wind for work.

But when talk turned to the breakthrough trade deal his government struck with the United States this week, he brightened up. Chan's family, hundreds of miles away in eastern China, cultivates rice. He hopes the trade deal will open lucrative export markets for their crop.

"The more the market opens, the more opportunities we'll have to make money," Chan said.

Excitement in China about the deal, which marked a milestone in China's campaign to join the World Trade Organization, extends beyond those who hope to measure its benefits in dollars, cents and improved trade figures.

Some hope entry into the group that makes the rules for world trade also will spur improvements in human rights, legal reforms and progress toward democracy.

"Economic opening will bring political opening," said veteran Beijing democracy campaigner Ren Wanding. "A free and private economy forms the base for a democratic system. So it will make China's government organs and legal system evolve toward democracy."

President Clinton's administration and others said growing trade, foreign contacts and WTO's rules on fair competition, open markets and legal process will help bring China closer to international norms.

Optimists also said foreign investment in China's telephones and Internet networks — now allowed under the market-opening deal — will make them cheaper and available to more Chinese, increasing the flow of information.

More Western movies will bring new ideas. More foreign lawyers and businessmen who will expect Chinese courts to enforce contracts could advance rule by law, rather than by bureaucrats. Foreign investment will create new jobs, offering a wider range of employment opportunities.

Wang Shan, a political commentator and author, said he believes Chinese leaders have not considered clearly the social changes WTO entry would bring.

"A free and private economy forms the base for a democratic system. So it will make China's government organs and legal system evolve toward democracy."

— Ren Wanding, veteran Beijing democracy campaigner

"They are not sufficiently prepared for the pressures on Chinese society," he said. "Chinese leaders feel that entering WTO will promote Chinese exports, open up world markets and attract investment. But Americans feel that once China enters this system great changes will occur in Chinese society, including political and social changes."

Dissident Lin Mu worries that trickle-down civil-rights improvements through increased trade will come too slowly and said foreign governments must pressure China over its human-rights record to bring about deeper change.

"It's an idle dream for the American government to think it can improve the human-rights situation with economic cooperation," said Lin, a one-time aide to former Communist Party leader Hu Yaobang.

Initially, jobs will become scarcer as ailing state firms and inefficient family farms succumb to foreign competition. China's state-run media, which have been selling the deal to the public all week, acknowledge that millions could be thrown out of work, including more than 9 million in agriculture. Despite having negotiated for WTO entry for 13 years, China's social security system remains primitive. Workers' protests, already common, could rise, prompting police to crack down.

At the Beijing overpass, a group of farmers from northern Hebei province who traveled to the capital in search of work during the slack winter farming season fretted that foreign imports could kill what little demand there is for their low-priced crops.

James Bond, 'Sleepy Hollow' pace record-setting weekend

By TOM VERDIN
The Associated Press

Industry analysts expected this year's total box ofice receipts to exceed $7.4 billion, topping last year's record by about $500 million.

LOS ANGELES — The unlikely tandem of James Bond and Ichabod Crane combined for what was shaping up to be a record-setting weekend at the box office, according to industry estimates Sunday.

The 19th episode in the Bond cinematic juggernaut, "The World is Not Enough," starring Pierce Brosnan, posted Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's largest opening three-day weekend ever, taking in $37.2 million in ticket sales through Sunday.

"Sleepy Hollow," the Tim Burton-directed version of Washington Irving's story, brought in $30.5 million.

It stars Johnny Depp as police constable Crane, who is investigating a series of murders supposedly committed by a headless horseman.

If estimates hold, studio executives said it would be the first time two films opening on the same weekend each grossed more than $30 million.

Industry analysts expected this year's total box office receipts to exceed $7.4 billion, topping last year's record by about $500 million.

"We're finding the audience is expanding in reaction to these great movies," said Paul Dergarabedian, president of Exhibitor Relations Co., a box-office tracking firm in Los Angeles.

In its second week, the animation film "Pokémon: The First Movie" fell to No. 3 as children smitten with the fighting cartoon characters hauled their parents to theaters, powering the film to $13.3 million this weekend and a total gross of $68.2 million.

In its third week of release, "The Bone Collector" placed fourth with $6.5 million.

Meanwhile, "Toy Story 2," which opens nationwide Wednesday, took in $302,000 at just one theater in Los Angeles.

That level of interest bodes well for the coming holiday weekend, which is expected to set another record on the strength of "The World is Not Enough," "Sleepy Hollow" and two more highly anticipated films set to open Wednesday, "Toy Story 2" and the new Arnold Schwarzenegger movie, "End of Days."

This holiday period could break last year's Wednesday-through-Sunday record of $183 million, Dergarabedian said.

"The World is Not Enough" broke MGM's previous opening weekend record of $26 million, set by another Bond film, "GoldenEye," in 1995.

The movie drew two key audiences: older Bond fans who have followed the sequence for its three-decade run, and younger fans the studio has tried to hook since introducing Brosnan as the lead character. This is his third Bond film.

"Sleepy Hollow" is the latest in a series of hugely successful supernatural thrillers this year, following "The Blair Witch Project" and "The Sixth Sense."

"Sixth Sense" is the No. 2 top-grossing movie this year, bringing in $270 million over 16 weeks. "The Phantom Menace," at $428 million, is tops.

Investigators continue to search for answers in EgyptAir crash

By FAIZA SALEH AMBAH
The Associated Press

CAIRO, Egypt — Six U.S. investigators are in Egypt looking into the backgrounds of passengers, crew members and anyone who had access to the EgyptAir plane before Flight 990 crashed into the Atlantic Ocean, a senior Western diplomat said Sunday.

The six investigators from the Federal Aviation Administration and the National Transportation Safety Board arrived Friday to "run through information, check facts, history ... records of the plane, individuals on board, who had access to the plane and some information that can only be accessed here," the diplomat said on condition of anonymity.

All 217 people aboard the Boeing 767 jet died when it went down Oct. 31 less than an hour after leaving New York for Cairo.

U.S. media reports last week speculating that the plane was crashed deliberately by one of the Egyptian co-pilots have angered many Egyptians and inspired the wrath of Egyptian media. Some pro-government newspapers have published theories implying U.S. authorities are blaming the crew to cover up sabotage or whatever really might have gone wrong.

But the Western diplomat said U.S.-Egyptian relations are unaffected. "Popular perception has taken a hit on both sides, but there has been no change at any level in intergovernmental relations," he said.

"Egyptian officials are quite satisfied with the cooperation in the investigation ,and we have not discerned the same sense of outrage by the officials that has been evident in the media and on the street," the diplomat said.

On Friday, NTSB head Jim Hall denounced speculative media reports about conversations taped by the cockpit's voice recorder.

Several news organizations quoted anonymous officials as saying the man in the co-pilot's seat, said to be Gameel El-Batouty, was heard saying on the tape: "I made my decision now. I put my faith in God's hands."

The first sentence — since disavowed — about making a "decision" had spurred theories of a suicidal person at the airplane's controls.

Egyptians often make religious references in everyday conversation, and many Egyptians have said comments by the co-pilot — if made at all — might have been misinterpreted.

most apparent changes students see.

"About 60 percent of what is the end result will be behind the scenes, like plumbing and electrical work," he said.

"Internally, things have been going on, but not the extent of what we have today."

Westberg said the plaza construction will possibly be well under way by fall 2000.

in business.

"Joe graduated from the University of Kansas, but several of his children went to K-State," Hobrock said. "He wanted to do something for K-State.

"His support had to be directly for students, so he contributed to a directly oriented student project that became Hale Library as we know it today," he said.

In 1951, Hale met and married Joyce A. Vanier. He also joined her father's Western Star Mill Co., which was purchased by Archer Daniels Midland in 1970.

Hale was named president of ADM Milling Co. in 1972 and retired as chairman in 1996.

In addition to his contribution to Hale Library, Hale helped build Hale Arena at the American Royal, the Hale Achievement Center and the Hale Music Media Center at the University of Kansas.

The memorial service will be at 1 p.m. Tuesday at Village Presbyterian Church, 6641 Mission Road, Prairie Village, Kan., with a reception following at the church.

The family requests no flowers and suggests contributions to the Friends of KSU Libraries or Friends of Murphy Hall at the University of Kansas.

"We are grateful that that the family would remember us at this point too," Hobrock said.

couple guys who hadn't played with us before," Brett Payne, senior in elementary education, said. "We made some mistakes because we hadn't played together before.

"We had a good showing," he said. "Both wins were big. But when we played bad, it showed."

In Polk High's two wins, the team outscored its opponents 84-13.

Alpha Chi Omega, K-State's other female team, was defeated in its only game Sunday, after splitting two games on Saturday.

The tournament, in its seventh year at Lincoln, has enjoyed much success, Nebraska intramural program assistant Jeff Latter said. But the weather, on the other hand, hasn't always been as nice as it was this year.

"This is the first that it hasn't snowed," Latter said. "We're just tickled about that. And, this is the latest we've ever scheduled it. Ice, rain, sleet. It can get nasty."

forward to getting away," said Jessica Miller, a freshman from York, Pa. She said many of the students on her bus, the second to crash, had been asleep.

"The fog was awful — we got off the bus and we couldn't even see each other right away. We didn't realize the extent of it until we got off the bus," she said. "I saw a girl holding her teeth in her hand. It was just unbelievable."

The driver of her bus, Robert Clifford Burge, 50, of Altoona, was killed. The student killed, whose name was not released, was in the first row of seats on the bus behind Burge's, Spanier said.

At least five people, including another bus driver who underwent surgery, remained hospitalized in serious condition Sunday, Spanier said. Police didn't know the conditions Sunday of the drivers and passengers in the cars.

Most of the other injuries were slightly, Spanier said.

Students who weren't injured gathered at the nearby Church of Saint Patrick after the crash until more buses arrived to take them back to State College. The trip had been organized by Penn State's Association of Residence Hall Students.

Cathy Bell, a cashier at the Bandit Truck Stop, said truck drivers were pulling off the road all night to avoid driving in the fog.

"It was almost like a whiteout," Bell said. "You would hit, like, a white spot where you couldn't see anything."

and everything. He'll probably just be a little stiff," Coach Randy Cole said. "He's going to give it a go. It'll be a good experience."

Niyongabo said although he looks forward to the meet, it will be a different experience from running with his team.

The women's team has a slightly different perspective. Junior Korene Hinds said the team will try to feed off each other to achieve the highest placing possible.

"I expect everybody's going to go out there and give it their best," Hinds said. "We're going to be pumped up to run our last meet, so everybody's going to go in there and give it their all."

The Cats have raced against all of the top-10 teams throughout the course of the season. Cole said this is to prepare them for the intensity of an NCAA meet — however, unlike last week's meet, the Cats don't have the pressure of trying to qualify for another meet.

All they have to do now is run.

"It's not the type of situation where we've got a lot of pressure on us," Cole said. "What happens then is you end up running real well without the pressure. You just get out and roll."

Cole said he doesn't have a particular place in mind for his team, but a top-10 placing definitely is feasible.

"I know they want to just go in and see how high they can place," Cole said. "We're going to try to put together a good race where all seven women have laid it on the line and run their best effort of the year and see where the chips fall."

School rifle teams in spotlight after spate of school shootings

By FRANK ELTMAN
The Associated Press

LYNBROOK, N.Y. — There's a what in the school basement?

That was the response many people had earlier this month when test results revealed high levels of lead in the Marion Street Elementary School, emanating from a basement rifle range.

It seems that for decades, the Lynbrook High School rifle teams used it for target practice and competition — a notion that alarmed parents who had fresh memories of school shootings in places like Littleton, Colo., and Springfield, Ore.

School officials in Lynbrook headed off a petition drive by parents and closed the rifle range following a three-day cleanup; the team now practices at a range off campus. It follows the lead of schools in places like Chicago, Arlington, Va., and elsewhere, where school-based rifle teams and rifle ranges have been shut down.

Charles Tacke, a rifle coach on Long Island for nearly 25 years, said there's no cause for alarm, contending that instructing students in the proper use of firearms is the surest prevention for tragedy.

"When people ask me about the issue of safety, I usually turn the question around," Tacke said. "How do you take out the only program that teaches gun safety and the proper way to handle a gun?"

He criticized the decision made by officials in the Chicago school system earlier this month, where Junior ROTC marksmanship classes were dropped in 33 schools.

"It shows there was an anti-gun bias in Chicago," Tacke said. "They didn't look at the value of the program."

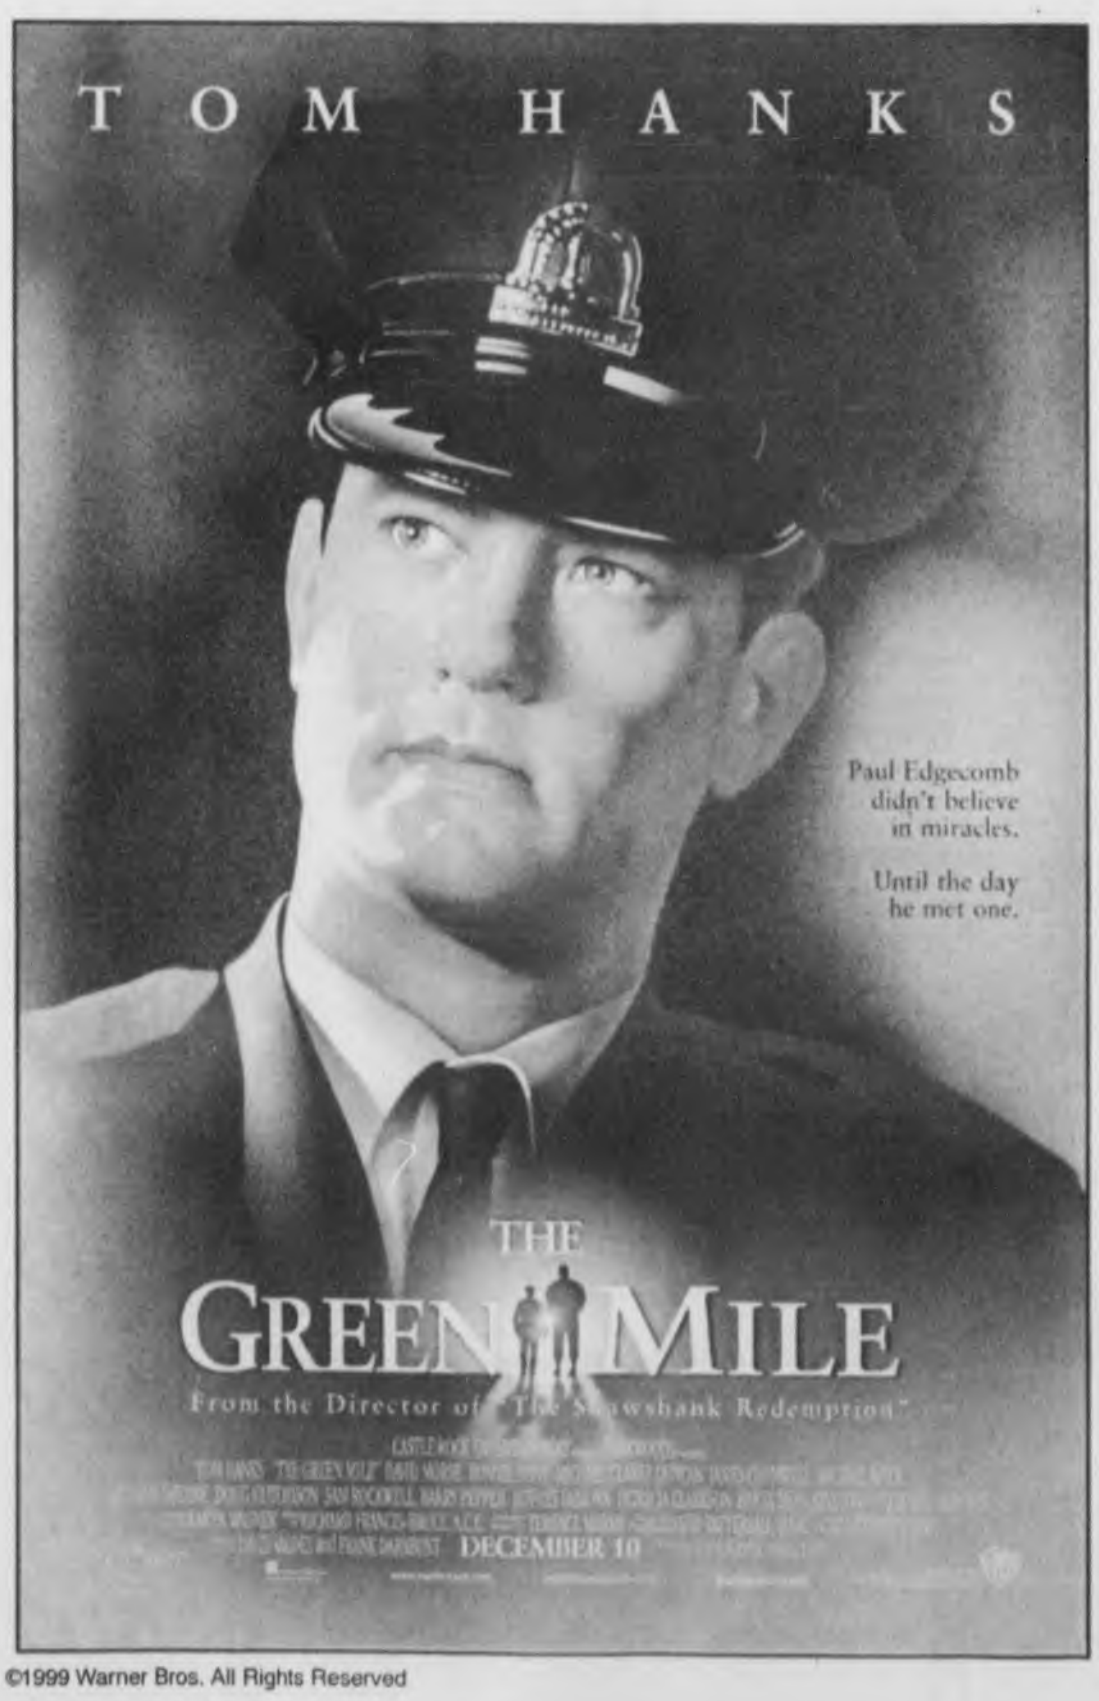
In explaining his decision, Chicago Schools CEO Paul Vallas wondered: "How can we have a zero tolerance policy that severely disciplines students for being caught with a gun in school or on the street when while we're teaching marksmanship?"

Kenneth Trump, who operates National School Safety and Security Services in Cleveland and has advised hundreds of districts around the country on safety, concedes that while rifle team members might act properly and receive good training, he worries about the mere presence of weapons on campus.

"I think we need to very narrowly focus on issue of safety of the children in a school setting," he said. "There's a greater risk for accidental injuries, and the potential for theft or misuse."

About 500 schools nationwide have rifle teams, including 26 in New York, according to Coaches Directory, a Missouri-based high school sports publisher.

Tacke said that when he was in high school on Long Island in the mid-60s, there were nearly three dozen rifle teams. He said many of the school-based teams were established between the first and second world wars in conjunction with civil defense efforts.



Today, with the Cold War a fading memory, only nine rifle teams remain on Long Island. He blamed a number of factors for the decline, starting with the assassinations of John F. Kennedy, his brother Robert, and Martin Luther King Jr.

Commissioners to meet, replace manager Greer

■ City commissioners plan to discuss temporary-replacement possibilities for city manager who quit on Tuesday.

By DANICA COTO
Kansas State Collegian

City commissioners will meet today to discuss who temporarily will replace city manager Gary Greer, who announced his resignation Tuesday.

The announcement came as a surprise to many, but commissioners said they were happy Greer was staying in Manhattan.

Greer will become vice president of Manhattan's Steel and Pipes Supply Co., which offered him the job two weeks ago.

"It's been a career goal of mine to be involved in city management until I was 40 years old," Greer said. "I wanted to break into the private industry."

Greer will be city manager until Dec. 23, and then an interim director will take his place. Commissioner Karen McCulloh said she doubts the City Commission will start searching for a new city manager until after New Year's.

"You have a lot of options," McCulloh said. "We have a number of important activities in the process and don't want to lose any momentum. We want someone who can step right in and carry on."

The interim director will be someone working for the city now, Commissioner Ed Klimek said. If all goes smoothly, commissioners will announce the temporary replacement after their executive session, he said.

Mayor Roger Reitz said Greer will be available for consultation after December, but meantime, the city will be looking for someone who is familiar with renovation, child care and Manhattan Economic Development Opportunity Funds Advisory Board issues.

"There is the problem of long-term effects and who would be ultimately taking responsibility for the decisions made," Reitz said. "Dealing with the city as a whole is quite a balancing act."

McCulloh said the search for a permanent city manager could take four to five months.

Greer, who has been city manager for four years, said the best experience was working with staff and the commission to bring about the Manhattan Corporate Technology Park, which was a long-needed project that hadn't been accomplished for 15 years.

"I think I've accomplished everything that I set out to do in my career. I really have no regrets," Greer said. "I'm thankful to be involved with quality projects and people."

Manhattan students use T-shirts to teach about rights of gays

■ Effort comes after officials removed Amnesty group's signs from hallways.

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Amnesty International members at Manhattan High School want to form a gay-straight alliance, but students say school administrators have not been in favor of such an action.

To kick off the gay-straight alliance campaign, group members placed posters around the school. When administrators took these posters down, it grew into something bigger, said Sally Oviatt, Manhattan High student and Amnesty chapter president.

"The administration is willing to stand up for students but needs to understand that gay, lesbian and bisexual students don't have a voice," Oviatt said. "They're shying away from controversy."

In an effort to educate students, faculty and administrators about gay and lesbian rights, 35 Manhattan High students recently wore T-shirts with the message "gay rights = human rights."

"It's the very beginning of our fight to get some acknowledgement of these issues," Oviatt said. "The students are letting everyone know they support the rights of gay and lesbian students."

By allowing the students to wear the T-shirts, Benson said the issue has been dealt with.

Robert Kelly, faculty sponsor of the Amnesty group, said the administration is supportive of gay rights and realizes there has been a problem.

"I don't try to teach the students anything," Kelly said. "Most come to the group with certain interests and compassion for other people. It's an avenue for people to express themselves."

Amnesty International, founded in the 1960s, has chapters all over the world and acts as a watchdog for human rights, Oviatt said.

Oviatt said Amnesty International targets a new campaign every year. In the past, she said the chapter at the high school has written letters to free political prisoners around the world.

In an effort to localize its efforts, the group decided to choose its own campaign this year. Oviatt said the goal is to build tolerance and awareness of gay and lesbian rights in the school.

"High school students have a tough time relating to someone in jail in another country," Oviatt said.

Crisis center closes after 30 years

■ Closure prompted by lack of volunteers; students urged to use other sources for help.

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

The FONE Crisis Center, a campus and community call-in crisis service that served people for 30 years, has been disbanded, ending a part of K-State history.

Carolyn McClaskey, former director of the FONE Crisis Center, said the center was disbanded because it was not being used by students or people in the community as often as it had been in the past.

"For the most part, students talk to family and friends instead of calling a crisis center," McClaskey said.

The center was opened in 1967 and ran successfully until December 1998, when it ceased operations temporarily. Tony Jurich, professor of family studies and human services and former member of the FONE Crisis Center advisory board, said the center had a long life, and a study conducted last spring showed there was no need for the center on campus or in the community anymore.

"The Student Governing Association sponsored a study, which found out that students will not use an anonymous crisis line," Jurich said. "They decided the funding for it would be put to better use somewhere else."

Gabe Eckert, student body vice president, was involved with the study and said students are encouraged to use other sources to help them with their problems.

"The FONE Crisis Center was an excellent service, but it reached its maximum potential," Eckert said. "The study showed that students are more apt to talk to their peers now, rather than a crisis center, but in severe cases there is always other resources to turn to."

The FONE Crisis Center was staffed by volunteers, and it had only three paid positions within the center.

McClaskey said the number of volunteers had decreased during the past few years, and the people who held the paid staff positions had resigned.

"In December of 1998, we closed temporarily, and we just never opened up for service again," McClaskey said.

Although the FONE Crisis Center was the only anonymous call-in service in Manhattan, other resources to find help include Pawnee Mental Health Services and Lafene Health Center.

Jurich said that as times change, people use other media to communicate their problems. Many more people are turning to family and friends than in the early days of the crisis center. Jurich also said people now are using technology more frequently to solve their problems.

"We found out many people get on chat rooms on the Internet to talk about what is bothering them," Jurich said. "That is scary, because people in those rooms may try to exploit or take advantage of the depressed."

The FONE Crisis Center served the K-State campus and the city of Manhattan successfully for many years, but the people involved with it as well as the people who used it understand that its time has passed, Jurich said.

"With the closing of the FONE Crisis Center, we have lost some of the heart of K-State," he said. "The closing is emblematic of a world where we need human connection, and for that, I mourn its passing."

Cat runners finish 5th at nationals

By SARAH CRAIG
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State women's cross country team finished fifth at the 1999 NCAA Championships on Nov. 21 in Bloomington, Ind. — the highest placing in school history.

The then-No. 9-ranked Wildcats were led by junior Korene Hinds, who finished 10th, freshman Amy Mortimer (12th) and junior Anne Wetterhus (39th). All three were named All-Americans — Hinds' second consecutive time.

"I felt great," Hinds said. "It went well — I competed pretty strong throughout the race. I'm not that surprised that we got fifth — they were expecting us to be ninth. At pre-nationals we got sixth, and some of the teams that we beat were ranked ahead of us, so it wasn't a surprise.

"I think it's awesome to be part of this team. I feel great. I feel good about that — being on a team that gets that a high score in nationals, that's something to feel good about."

Mortimer said the field of 31 teams made for a tough race.

"Everyone was running so fast that I wasn't able to move up like I wanted to," Mortimer said. "Our team ran a great race, though, and it was a great team finish."

Head coach Randy Cole said the team's preparation throughout the season helped it succeed in the NCAA meet.

"They'd had the chance to run against everybody, so they'd gone through the gauntlet, and they'd been running so well they just wanted to get running and see how they could do," Cole said. "They did a nice job of being patient and moving up through the course."

Brigham Young won the meet, followed by Arkansas, Stanford and Wisconsin.

This is Cole's third year at K-State. In his first year, Wetterhus qualified individually. In his second season,

WTO takes heat from Teamsters days before start of trade discussion

By MARTIN CRUTSINGER
The Associated Press

SEATTLE — The World Trade Organization, getting ready to stage the largest trade event ever in the United States, was attacked Sunday by the Teamsters union president for putting corporate greed ahead of human rights.

With much riding on the outcome of the talks, the Clinton administration defended its decision to invite trade ministers from around the world to the Pacific Northwest in hopes of launching a new round of global trade talks.

Commerce Secretary William Daley said the administration's embrace of the global marketplace and lower trade barriers has contributed to booming U.S. exports and the country's longest peacetime economic expansion.

"This economy is strong ... and it will remain strong because of the sort of outward view we've had about trade, not an inward view," Daley told Reform Party presidential hopeful Pat Buchanan in a joint appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Critics such as Teamsters head James P. Hoffa and Buchanan contend the WTO is sacrificing worker rights, environmental protection and human rights in order to please multinational corporations that want trade barriers erased.

Hoffa, whose union is among the labor groups organizing protests in Seattle, said on "Fox News Sunday" the demonstrators simply want a seat at the table to ensure the WTO stops putting corporate

Kansan dies after suffering injuries in Russian roulette

WICHITA — A 33-year-old Garden City man has died from injuries he suffered while playing Russian roulette.

Freddie Valverde loaded a small revolver with two blank cartridges used to drive nails into cement, while playing the game Nov. 13 with an acquaintance, authorities said.

The friend, a 47-year-old man, put the gun to his head and pulled the trigger with no harm done, officials said. But when Valverde took his turn, the gun went off.

Valverde was taken to a Garden City hospital before being airlifted to Wichita. He died Wednesday.

Authorities have ruled the shooting accidental.

4 dead after plane crashes into Columbia River waters

STEVENSON, Wash. — A small float plane crashed into the Columbia River shortly after it left the water, killing all four people on board.

The pilot was believed to be the chairman of the Portland-based Macheezmo Mouse restaurant chain, The Oregonian reported Sunday.

William S. Warren, 48, was traveling with his children after a Thanksgiving gathering, family members told the newspaper.

Dive teams retrieved two bodies — a man believed to be Warren and a child, the Oregonian said. Technical difficulties and inclement weather forced them to delay recovery of the other two bodies until Sunday.

Warren's three sons, aged 9, 13 and 14, were in the plane with him, the Oregonian said.

Police charge 11-year-old following 100-mph chase

ALPHARETTA, Ga. — An 11-year-old boy was arrested Saturday after police chased him in a stolen car at speeds of more than 100 mph.

The boy, whose name was withheld because of his age, was charged with several traffic violations and forgery because he had a counterfeit $100 bill, police said.

"We've never seen anything like this before with someone this young," police spokesman Chris Lagerbloom said.

It started when police tried to stop a reckless driver traveling south on Georgia 400, a freeway connecting Atlanta with its northern suburbs.

"When they attempted to stop him, he sped off," Lagerbloom said. "He topped out at about 110 miles an hour."

Minister's 'warped toy' list becoming more gruesome

HARTFORD, Conn. — The playthings topping a Hartford minister's annual "warped toy" list have gone from gross to gruesome.

When the Rev. Christopher Rose began compiling the list in 1986, most of the toys he targeted featured mucous or vomit. The themes have grown increasingly violent to include dolls with severed limbs and cut-off human faces.

"At first I thought this was going to be a better year," said Rose, the rector of Grace Episcopal Church. "I was wrong."

The toy topping Rose's list: Curse of Spawn action figure Ryan Hatchet, the bloody disemboweled corpse of a former high school student. It comes with an ax/spear weapon, a shovel, a bendable spine, a handful of bloody hearts and intestines and a small plastic face that can be hung on its belt.

Its maker, McFarlane Toys, did not return calls seeking comment. After last year's list criticized some of his company's toys, Todd McFarlane said parents, not censors, should decide what their children should be allowed to play with.

Among toys on Rose's 1999 list:

—The Ice Man Cryogenic Lab, which includes drip tray, fake syringe and other autopsy accessories and says on the box, "Chip, Carve and Melt your way down to the guts!"

—The action figure Tormentor, described on its package as "a savage brute with no soul" who "lives to inflict torment, pain and terror on others."

—World Wrestling Federation action figures Jacqueline, a large-breasted, scantily clad woman, and Al Snow, which comes with the severed head of a woman.

Last year, Rose's worst offender was the wrestler action figure "Macho Man Randy Savage" that taunts "Is that all you got?" or "Hey, you're bashin' in my gut!" when it is hit in the chest or its limbs are twisted.

Naked man's sword attack at church leaves 10 injured

LONDON — A naked sword-wielding man burst Sunday into a London church during Mass, slashing and stabbing members of the congregation. Ten people were injured, three seriously.

Six of the injured suffered stab wounds, including a man who lost part of a hand. The others were hurt in a stampede to get out of St. Andrew's Roman Catholic Church in Thornton Heath, a London suburb.

Two other men armed with sticks followed the man into the church, lashing out at some of the 400-member congregation, the priest, Canon John Lennon, said.

Canon is a rank of priest senior to father but below monsignor.

Several men in the congregation, including an off-duty policeman, wrestled the man to the ground as he lashed out with the 3-foot-long sword, witnesses said.

Politics, government led graduate back to K-State

BY JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sue Peterson was raised with Kansas politics — a tradition she continued as former Kansas Gov. Mike Hayden's chief of staff and now as assistant to K-State president Jon Wefald.

PETERSON

"My whole life, I was interested in politics," Peterson said. "I thought I could be president until Kennedy got shot, and then I decided that might be a little too dangerous. There was never any question in my mind that I was coming to K-State to major in political science."

Peterson's duties at K-State include working with the state and national legislatures on behalf of the university and teaching Kansas Politics and Government, in addition to her role as the president's assistant.

Peterson, a 1976 K-State graduate in political science and history, said she decided to leave the governor's office in 1989 after working with K-State on funding issues.

"I was working with K-State, and then there was an opening. I had met everybody and liked working with them," Peterson said. "It was just a good opportunity. The 1989 legislative session was extremely productive. I wanted to go out on a high point.

"It was very hard to leave. You don't just walk out of the governor's office," she said.

Peterson took a position at K-State working with legislative and elected officials on behalf of K-State, which kept her in close contact with Kansas politics. Later, her position was modified to include federal government relations.

"She is the best there is in the state," Wefald said. "I don't think any other university has a better contact in the halls of the legislature than Sue. She works with Republicans, Democrats, liberals and conservatives to get the job done. She also works with the House of Representatives and Senate in Washington, D.C.," Wefald said.

Peterson said one of the best things about politics is the change with each election.

"It never gets boring for me because the personalities involved in the process change all the time," she said.

"It never gets boring for me because the personalities involved in the process change all the time."

— Sue Peterson, assistant to Jon Wefald

"Government has changed a lot to become a more inclusive process," Peterson said. "It is much broader now. Everyone in Legislature has a say in the decision-making process. That's fine, every vote counts — all 165 of them."

The recent bill to include all community colleges, technical schools and universities into the Kansas Board of Regents might affect the way the legislature votes on higher-education issues, Peterson said.

"Legislature is driven by its constituents. Universities are located in one place, and the Legislature may have their own priorities — that's the name of the game. It is supposed to be one system, one voice," Peterson said. "We are all committed to working very hard. Hopefully, the three sectors of post-secondary education can agree on one common goal. It will broaden the legislative base by adding to the system."

Vote brings Northern Ireland closer to permanent peace

Ulster Unionist party breaks stalemate; compromise will give power to people

BY LAWRENCE L. KNUTSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With one less obstacle to peace in Northern Ireland, President Clinton said Saturday the path is clear to put the government directly in the hands of all the people.

The president issued a statement after leaders of the Ulster Unionist party, Northern Ireland's largest political party, broke the latest stalemate by backing a compromise plan to rescue the Belfast peace accord.

The vote opens the way for party leader David Trimble to attempt to form a new Protestant-Catholic coalition government without waiting for the Irish Republican Army to start disarming, the principle sticking point.

Clinton, who has worked since 1994 on ending bloodshed in Northern Ireland, hailed the vote as an historic step toward peace and an important move toward implementing all aspects of last year's Good Friday accord.

"Beginning next week, government in Northern Ireland is being put back directly in the hands of all the people," the president said.

"I welcome this progress and urge all parties to continue working together on building the foundations for lasting peace," Clinton said.

Clinton congratulated Trimble on his leadership in bringing about a successful vote in the Ulster Unionist Council. Party leaders approved the compromise, 480-349.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., also commended both sides for ending their entrenched opposition and for putting peace and the people of Northern Ireland first.

He said the peace process "is still fragile, but at last it is back on track."

Clinton began intervening in 1994 when he authorized a visa so Gerry Adams, president of the Sinn Fein, the IRA's principle political ally, could visit the United States.

Clinton twice has traveled to Northern Ireland, and named a special envoy, former Sen. George Mitchell of Maine, to helped mediate the peace process.

FTC intends to approve $81 billion oil merger; some states not satisfied with plans

■ Exxon takeover of Mobil would put company among largest energy suppliers.

BY TED BRIDIS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Federal Trade Commission is indicating to states it intends to recommend approval of Exxon Corp.'s $81 billion acquisition of Mobil Corp., government sources close to the deal said Saturday.

The merger would create one of the world's largest energy companies.

Some states, however, are not satisfied with a proposal worked out by the companies and the FTC that includes the sale of about 2,400 gas stations nationwide. It is unlikely those states could stop the deal, though officials could lobby FTC commissioners in the days before the vote or could ask a court to block it.

Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal, who opposes the deal, said states were concerned, for example, about unfair treatment of the owners of the divested gas stations after a deal was approved.

"The potential for a single state like Connecticut to block the merger is unlikely," Blumenthal said. "There may be a critical mass of states that could go to court, but I don't predict that will happen."

Two government officials close to the talks, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Saturday that the FTC's five commissioners were expected to vote on the deal early next week.

The New York Times reported Saturday that New Hampshire also has notified federal regulators that it was leaning against the deal.

The newspaper said other states, including Texas and California, have agreed with the terms offered by Mobil and Exxon.

Nathan Barankin, spokesman for California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, said Saturday, "It's been under review for a long time and it's something that Lockyer has taken a particular interest in."

Ted Delisi, a spokesman for Texas Attorney General John Cornyn, said he would not discuss ongoing negotiations.

The centerpiece of the agreement between Exxon and Mobil — the nation's largest and second-largest oil producers, respectively — is the sale of about 2,400 gas stations, roughly 15 percent of the companies' retailers around the country.

Calls to New Hampshire officials went unanswered Saturday.

"Based on our ongoing discussions with the FTC, we fully expect the FTC to complete their review soon," Tom Cirigliano, a spokesman for Irving, Texas-based Exxon, said Saturday.

Mobil, based in Fairfax, Va., has been closed since Wednesday afternoon.

The centerpiece of the agreement between Exxon and Mobil — the nation's largest and second-largest oil producers, respectively — is the sale of about 2,400 gas stations, roughly 15 percent of the companies' retailers around the country.

Exxon also would sell a refinery in Benicia, Calif., and the companies would sell substantial interests in several pipelines throughout the United States.

The news comes as federal and some state officials have raised antitrust questions about another huge oil merger, BP Amoco's proposed $29 billion purchase of Atlantic Richfield Co.

In the BP Amoco-Arco deal, executives from the companies are expected to reach a final agreement allaying antitrust and other concerns raised by the state of Alaska, said Bob King, spokesman for Alaska Gov. Tony Knowles.

Alaska officials and lawyers involved in negotiating that deal said the arrangement did not sufficiently protect consumers in California and other states that have experienced higher-than-average prices at the pump this year. Lockyer also has been working closely with the FTC on that deal.

BCS worthless beyond determining champion

In theory, the Bowl Championship Series is a good idea. In practice, it really could use some work, especially if K-State doesn't get a bid to one of its bowls this season.

The rankings are a success. There might be debate about which categories should carry more weight, but in the end, it's a fair way to assess college football teams. It's equal across the board. And numbers rarely lie.

OUR view

The problem is the way those numbers are used. Generally, those numbers aren't used to reward teams or their fans.

No. 1 and No. 2 in the BCS poll are rewarded for their efforts with money and prestige in the national championship game. After No. 1 and No. 2 get their rewards, the BCS rankings are ignored in favor of making money for corporate sponsors. To choose other teams for the series, the BCS looks at conference champions and then how much money in television revenue and tickets a team's fans can generate. No. 3 doesn't mean anything, as K-State can attest after finishing last season ranked third in the BCS, and locked out of the championship series.

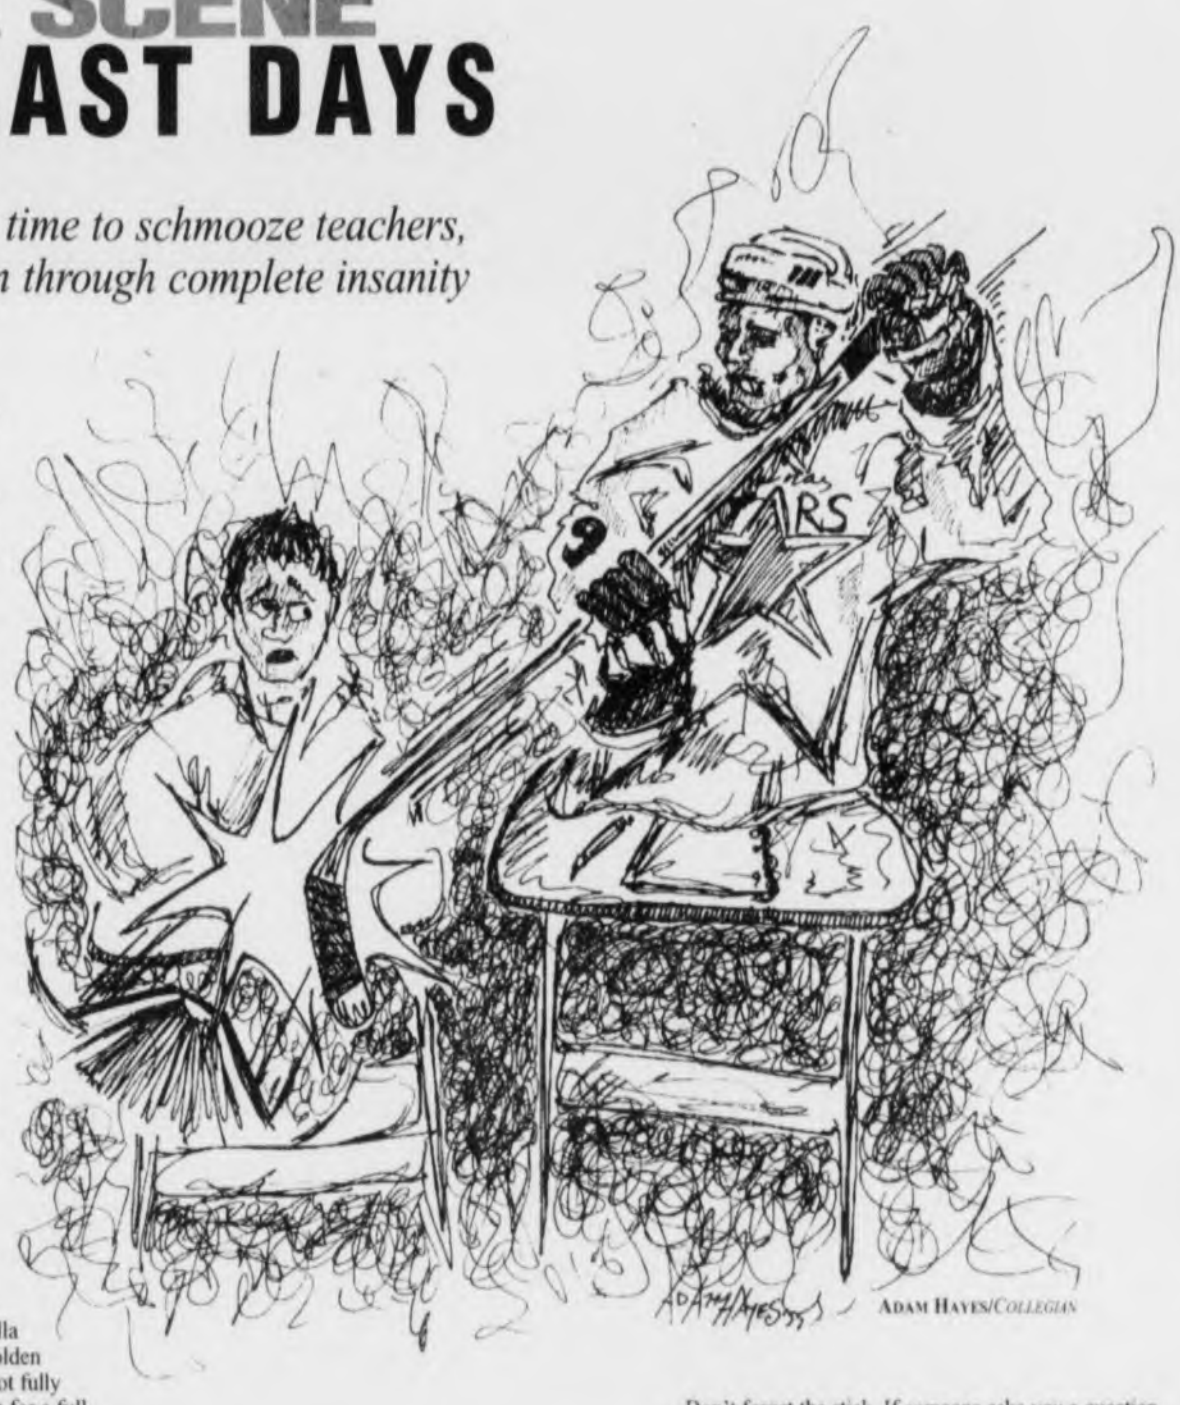
OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.



In order to call the series a championship series, it should be just that. If a team finishes in the top eight, it should play in the championship series and reap rewards for its successful season.

That said, it is necessary to keep teams in somewhat regional bowls. Two East Coast teams probably aren't going to fill the Rose Bowl stadium in California. So provisions could be made to put teams in bowl games that fans could attend. That doesn't mean leaving any of the eight out, it just means placing the top two teams in a championship game and carefully assigning the remaining top-six teams to other bowls in the series based on which teams together would make the best matchups and which teams could get fans to a particular bowl.

K-State got the equivalent of a poke in the eye with a sharp stick from last year's BCS. If college football bowl games are about money and money alone, then K-State might not get a bid to a BCS bowl. If they are about anything else as they should be, then K-State has earned the right to compete against a top team in a prestigious bowl.

MAKE A SCENE in the LAST DAYS

End of semester allows time to schmooze teachers, leave lasting impression through complete insanity

ADAM HAYES/COLLEGIAN

You're almost out of time.

There are theories that there's a singularity at the end of time. It's sort of like a fourth-dimensional black hole, causing time to speed up the further we go, the longer we live. Maybe that's true, or maybe all the caffeine's finally catching up with me. At any rate, I know the last 14 weeks swept by like A.J. Foyt plowing through a Sonic drive-thru in third gear.

The way I count it, you've got, oh, 10 days of class, counting today, to make an impression on your instructors. Maybe you've already done that. Maybe when you rush to talk to them after class, they scoot backwards and clutch a taser protectively. Maybe there's a huge skull-and-crossbones magic-markered in on your chair in the seating chart the instructor carries into class. In that case, you can rest now.

Or maybe your class doesn't know who you are. Does anyone mutter "Oh, God," and cower whenever you raise your hand? Have you made anyone cry in class? Just by looking at them? If not, well, dammit, you need to make an impression. Time's running out.

This is a game. It's not too removed from the game of replacing words in movie titles with the word "anus" and sharing them with the room. (I think we hit a high point with "How Stella Got Her Anus Back," and "The Man With the Golden Anus"). This is for entertainment value only. If not fully satisfied, return the unused portion of this column for a full refund.

Distinguish yourself. Consider this a challenge. If someone glances through the Royal Purple and happens across your photo, you don't want a slightly mystified grumble of "Hmm, I think I remember ..." No. You want cries of terror, screams of blind rage, tears of joy or general heart palpitations. And it can all start now.

Look around the room. Right now. Go ahead, nobody's watching. You see the guy to your right? Push him over. Reason? Bah! You don't need a reason! PUSH HIM OVER!

There. That's better.

Oh, no. The instructor's looking at you. Good job, Ace. Quick. Slip the Alka-Seltzer into your mouth. Start convulsing. (If you need help convulsing, take a swig of Coke. We're close enough to the year 2000 that Pepsi already should be programming our DNA to reject Coke.) Make a run for Lafene. Stop by the Union, grab a chalupa. Make a scene. Wrestle for it. Don't take no for an answer.

There probably are other ways to distinguish yourself, most likely through academic performance, community involvement, extracurricular achievement and genuine, lifelong friendship. But you can't beat the instant success of utter insanity.

Maybe you're not into the direct physical confrontation. Maybe you're better suited to distinction through perpetual non sequiturs. The correct answer to "What is the capital of Arizona?" becomes "2x + 3." Answer story problems through interpretive dance. Instead of making buildings from balsa wood and glue, use cheese.

Bring dead pets to class. Make noises as if they still were alive. Make them attack your classmates. Throw them like footballs. If they're hamsters, flick them across the room.

Wear hockey gear to class. Include the helmet or mask.

Don't forget the stick. If someone asks you a question, poke-check their notebook away from them. Hip-check your instructor into the boards. If you get a question wrong, spend two minutes in the corner by yourself.

Hug everyone. Hug everyone when you walk into class. Hug anyone who speaks. Hug anyone who asks you a question. When someone finally hits you (and they will), bite them.

Go the entire day pretending you're a trout. Flop around a lot. You can't speak; you're a trout. Breathe through your cheeks.

Look, whatever it is you're going to do, do it now. December's almost here. We're on a tight schedule. Just make sure everyone remembers who you were and who you are.

Powers of World Trade Organization should frighten Americans

Would you be scared if a secretive organization, unelected and unaccountable, could overturn laws of your community or country? Halloween might be over, but a corporate Frankenstein walks the planet.

The World Trade Organization is making enforceable global laws giving corporations ultimate control over the world economy, our lives and the planet. The WTO was created by the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs in 1995 to enforce international trade regulations. Member countries, 134 of them including the United States, can challenge each other's laws as violations of WTO rules. Cases are decided in secret by a panel of three professional trade bureaucrats.

Every single environmental and public health law brought before the WTO courts so far has been ruled illegal. Member countries then must change their laws, pay compensation to the winner or face non-negotiated trade sanctions.

When signing on, member nations grant the WTO absolute authority to supersede local, state and national laws if a corporation pressures its government to challenge a particular mandate. The WTO's main goal is to create a fully integrated global capitalist economy "free" of any "discriminatory" barriers to trade or "lost market opportunities." Case studies show it is corporations who win and democracy that loses.

On behalf of its oil industry, Venezuela challenged the U.S. Clean Air Act regulation that required gas refiners to produce cleaner gas. A WTO panel ruled against the U.S. law. Foreign oil refiners now have the option to sell dirtier gasoline in the United States as a result.

Japan is challenging a Massachusetts state law that requires companies to sever ties with the military dictatorship in Burma before getting government contracts. If WTO rules the Massachusetts law illegal, we will lose a major tool that helped bring down apartheid in South Africa.

Using the WTO's logic, other barriers to free trade could include minimum-wage laws, toxic emissions controls or bans on lead in plumbing. Lost market opportunities, as defined by corporations, could include Canada's national health care, our public universities, or limits on logging in national forests.

The WTO meets in Seattle Tuesday through Friday. They will be met by tens of thousands of citizens from around the world who disagree with the free-trade robbery. Tuesday, people all over the world will organize human billboards, school walkouts, teach-ins, lobby trips and workplace actions to send a message that the WTO has got to go. Visit www.internationalistbooks.com for links to fair-trade activism across the world.

K-State college attempts to help students enroll in needed classes

Editor,

I completely understand concern and frustration regarding the availability of certain classes, and I know many students share those feelings. However, there are some things they should know.

First, we do everything in our power to see that students graduate on time. So far as I know, there is not a single business student whose graduation has been delayed because of an inability to get into classes. Some students might not get a class in the semester they would like, but they will get a seat when they truly need one. Certain groups of students must have the two accounting courses earlier than others, because they are prerequisites to one or more courses in their major field of study.

For other students, the need to complete these classes in the sophomore year is much less urgent. We try to reserve about five seats in each section of the two accounting classes so we can place students who must have them and who enrolled after the classes closed.

The Department of Accounting has a system for managing the wait lists that allows us to successfully deal with the problem. Students could help by not putting themselves on multiple wait lists. This makes more work for the people managing the wait lists, because they have to go through and remove duplicates.

The College of Business Administration depends on the Department of Statistics to schedule STAT 350 and 351. The department head and administrators in the College of Arts and Sciences dean's office have been extremely helpful in providing as many seats as possible. Again, so far as I know, these classes have not been responsible for graduation delays.

There are several reasons the demand for the two accounting courses is so great. First, every one of the 2,750 students in the College of Business is required to take them. Second, many other majors require these programs. For example, students in hotel and restaurant management, grain science and many others are required to take these classes. Third, a large number of people are opting for a minor in business that includes these two courses. Finally, both of the accounting courses and one of the statistics courses are university general education courses. This increases demand.

The obvious solution to the problem is to teach more classes or to move the classes into rooms that can accommodate more students. Unfortunately, these are not viable options. The International Association For Management Education, the accrediting agency for the College of Business, limits our faculty to teaching an average of 400 undergraduate or 300 graduate credit hours a semester. Adding classes or making them larger would endanger our status as an accredited business program.

Enrollment in the College of Business has increased about 30 percent during the past three years. We see this growth as a testimony to the quality of our programs. However, finding the resources to deal with such significant increases has been a challenge.

One key is for students and their academic advisers to work together to develop a sound, long-range plan for graduation. Advising is, after all, a team sport, and your adviser can help you find a solution to your dilemma.

Manhattan Avenue improvements deserve praise for effectiveness

Editor,

The Manhattan Public Works Department and everyone else involved deserves recognition for a fine solution to the pedestrian crossing problem on North Manhattan Avenue.

One year after a near-fatal accident involving a K-State student at Old Claflin Road, an island has been added at Vattier Street, pedestrian crossings have been made more visible, four lanes have been reduced to two plus a turning lane, bicycle lanes have been added and a greater number of signs warn motorists about what is ahead.

I have heard from many students how much easier it is to cross the street. I have observed that most motorists keep speeds closer to the 30-mph limit than before. Traffic seems to be flowing as well as before with the new turning lanes, and most students appear to be a little more careful before leaping out into the path of oncoming vehicles. I was doubtful myself that some median work and some paint would make that much difference, but I was wrong. North Manhattan Avenue now is safer for everyone except the most careless.

Some motorists still try to imitate Jeff Gordon coming off the hill at Claflin. Some pedestrians still consider themselves immortal and impervious to sheet metal. It remains to be seen how a new, wider Anderson Avenue will work out. So, please be careful on the streets around campus. They are our students out there.

K-State livestock-judging team places 2nd at nationals

By Tracy Doile
Kansas State Collegian

A second-place finish in the nation would be disappointing only to a team that is accustomed to dominating.

Such was the case for the K-State livestock judging team. The team took second place behind Texas A&M at the National Livestock Judging competition in Louisville, Ky., on Nov. 15 and 16.

The judging team had won the competition for the past five years.

Jennifer Hotchkiss, senior in animal science and industry and agriculture journalism, said the recent winning streak added a greater amount of pressure going into the competition.

"That's just unheard of, winning five years in a row," she said. "That made this contest tougher for us."

Dan Shike, Jason Hoffman, Kyle Colyer and Clay Franklin, all seniors in animal science and industry, made up the rest of the team.

Hotchkiss said the team members had their hearts set on taking first place.

"It was very disappointing. There's so much history and tradition," she said. "K-State has such a great reputation."

Hotchkiss said the team wanted to do well not only because of K-State's outstanding reputation, but for its coach's sake.

"No other coach is as good as our coach," she said. "You feel like you've let your coach down."

Scott Schaake, associate professor of animal science and coach of the livestock judging team, said he wasn't let down.

"They did well," he said. "They actually scored enough points that would win that contest nine out of 10 years. A&M had a really good team and a slightly better day than we did. It was tough on them. There was a lot of pressure."

Hotchkiss said the point spread was extremely tight.

"It was a really close contest," Hotchkiss said. "There weren't that many points separating us from first place."

Points are scored by how closely a contestant's judging list compares with the officials' list. Every team member judges 12 classes of animals. Then, contestants provide oral reasons for eight of these classes. The eight classes are selected by an official at the contest. There are 50 points possible for each oral reason.

"That's just unheard of, winning five years in a row. That made this contest tougher for us."

— Jennifer Hotchkiss, senior in animal science

Schaake said at the national tournament three cattle, three swine and two sheep classes were chosen for oral reasons.

Hotchkiss said the oral reasons create excitement because they provide an opportunity to make comments that really make a contestant stand out.

Hotchkiss said the contest in Louisville, Ky., was especially emotional since it was the last of the season. Judging team members compete the spring of their junior year and the fall of their senior year.

"We did accomplish a lot this year," she said. "We've had our success throughout the year."

Kevin Donnelly, assistant dean of agriculture academic programs, commended the team for continuing the winning tradition. He said the team's winning tradition is much like the football team's success in that some wins are often taken for granted.

"When you're first for so long, you don't hear about the Utah State games," he said.

The team did not enjoy only small wins, though.

Schaake said the team took first at two out of the three main national tournaments — the American Royal in Kansas City, Mo., on Oct. 31 and the team's first contest in Denver last spring.

"I think we had an excellent year," Schaake said. "They had a great season."

Recent report says future of America's children in jeopardy

By David Mark
The Associated Press

Neglect, substance abuse, teen pregancy top list of most critical threats to youth

Grinding poverty, violent crime and absent parents are some of the gravest threats facing American children, according to a new report by children's advocacy groups and civic organizations.

"The problems confronting our children truly are challenges to all of America," said Mary Ellen Maxwell, president of the National School Boards Association. "Either we meet these challenges or they will become obstacles to our future."

The report is the result of combined efforts of the National School Boards Association, the National League of Cities, Hollywood, Fla.,-based Joe DiMaggio Children's Hospital and Youth Crime Watch of America, a national nonprofit organization.

The report, "Ten Critical Threats To America's Children: Warning Signs to the Next Millennium," will be presented Monday at the National Press Club in Washington during a news conference with representatives from each of the organizations.

Among the most critical threats against the nation's children are abuse and neglect at home, substance abuse, teen pregnancy, inadequate child care, lack of health care, poor schools, and dangers in the environment.

For each problem detailed in the document, there is an accompanying list of solutions.

Some solutions prescribed in the report — like raising the minimum wage and universal health care— are potential political hot-button issues.

Ron Sachs, spokesman for the coalition that put the report together, said the purpose of the report was to bring awareness to the problems, not to advance specific legislation.

"What these groups have done is to say there needs to be a national agenda on children's issues," Sachs said. "These problems are not new. They are chronic — they are pervasive."

Clarence Anthony, president of the National League of Cities and mayor of South Bay, Fla., said the report includes common sense solutions to problems.

"This report is not about gloom and doom — it's about the obstacles our children face and embracing a national agenda that will benefit them in the next millennium," Anthony said.

The Nutcracker

The family favorite is back for the holiday season. Danced by Ukraine's renowned Kyiv Ballet, this production returns to E.T.A. Hoffmann's tale and focuses on a young girl's unrequited love for a phantom prince and her journey into womanhood. Canada's Shumka dancers enliven the battle between the mice and toy soldiers and turn up as high-kicking Cossacks in the second act fantasy sequence.

"This Nutcracker is a more challenging spectacle...It's a fresh alternative to the Disneyesque versions we've come to expect."

Cats lose 2 games in Mexico

■ Women's basketball team falls to 1-2 after tournament losses last week in Cancun.

BY SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team fell to 1-2 on the season last week, losing to No. 7 North Carolina State and Alabama at the Tourneo Cancun de Basquetbol in Cancun, Mexico.

FINKES

Alabama defeated the Cats, 63-60. Trailing just before the buzzer, Kristin Rethman attempted a tying three-pointer, but it didn't fall.

Three Wildcats scored in double figures, led by senior Angie Finkes' 19 points. She also led the team with nine rebounds, followed by Nicky Ramage's eight, but the Cats were outrebounded, 54-43.

Alabama shot 46.7 percent from three-point range to the Cats' 15.4 percent, hitting four of 26 attempts. K-State struggled with fouls as well. Olga Firsova fouled out in just nine minutes of play.

The Cats led, 60-56, with two minutes remaining, but couldn't stop Alabama's closing 7-0 run.

K-State fought NC State to the final second in the Cats' second game, falling, 73-72. K-State had the final possession of the game but couldn't score.

Firsova bounced back from her foul-prone performance to lead the team with 15 points and seven rebounds. The Cats shot 43.8 percent from the floor, 29.4 percent from three-point range, and three players scored in double figures.

NC State also had three players score in double figures, and grabbed 31 rebounds to the Cats' 29.

The Cats led at halftime, 35-27, but NC State rallied in the second half.

K-State takes on Eastern Michigan at 7 p.m. Tuesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

Men's basketball team prepares for game with Texas-San Antonio

STORY BY DEREK BOSS

After winning their season home opener, the Wildcats are set to take on visiting University of Texas-San Antonio at 7 tonight at Bramlage Coliseum.

In the Wildcats last outing, K-State (1-1) defeated Northwestern State 76-71 behind senior forward Tony Kitt's double-double, finishing with 13 points and 10 rebounds.

Three other Wildcat forwards scored in double figures, including senior Josh Reid with 14, junior Kevin Howell with 13 and sophomore Travis Reynolds with 10. Nine different players scored for the Wildcats en route to the victory.

K-State held a tremendous 44-24 edge over the Demons on the boards and shot 46 percent from the floor.

Nevertheless, the Wildcats 26 turnovers against Northwestern State could pose a potential problem going into tonight's matchup with UTSA.

The Roadrunners (3-0) are coming off an 18-win season last year, a Southland Conference Tournament Championship and their first NCAA tournament berth in 11 years.

Tim Carter, Southland Conference's coach of the year last season, has eight lettermen returning, including four starters.

Sophomore small forward Devin Brown, SLC freshman of the year last season, is back along with sophomore power forward McEverett Powers. The Roadrunners also will return two senior veterans, center Leon Watson and point guard Lloyd Williams, who are three-year starters in the UTSA program.

Last year, the four combined to average 43.7 points, 20.8 rebounds and 8.5 assists per game.

Williams needs only 12 assists to become the all-time leader for the Roadrunners. His team-leading 58 steals last year also could pose difficulty for the Wildcat backcourt of junior Galen Morrison and senior Cortez Groves.

Brown led the Roadrunners scoring attack last season, producing 16.7 points per game, ranking him as one of the nation's top freshman scorers. Watson averaged 12.2 points and led the team in rebounding and blocked shots.

In Carter's four years at UTSA, the program has produced the conference newcomer and freshman of the year three times. This season, the Roadrunners have another solid candidate for newcomer honors in 6-8 junior center Mahcoe Parker.

UTSA's game tonight will start an eight-game road trip for the Roadrunners, while the Wildcats will play their second contest of a five-game homestand.

This is only the second meeting in history between K-State and UTSA. The Wildcats faced the Roadrunners in K-State's 1991-92 season opener, bursting out to a 48-29 halftime lead and finishing with a 103-65 victory over UTSA.

Big 12 football matchups provide fans with quality post-turkey entertainment

VIEWPOINT

FRANK FLATON

Ah, Thanksgiving break. Those two words bring almost as much joy and relaxation as my other two favorite words (body massage).

Although I didn't get any Swedish treatment over the break, this Thanksgiving break turned out pretty well.

Usually, Thanksgiving ends up being a code word for food fight at my house, but this time, with the help of the pigskin, it was peaceful.

Besides indulging in three days of turkey and stuffing bliss, this Thanksgiving was the best Turkey Day ever, for two finger-licking, jaw-smacking, delicious reasons:

Reason 1: Nebraska at Colorado

Colorado quarterback Mike Moschetti doesn't look like much. He's only 6 feet tall and weighs only 195 pounds soaking wet. This quarterback from La Mirada, Calif., doesn't look like your average prototypical passer (6-4, 220) and possesses inconsistent tendencies.

But don't tell him that. Against Big 12 North Division rival Nebraska, Moschetti played as tough and as ruthless as Joe Pesci did in "Casino" or "Goodfellas."

With the Buffaloes trailing by 21 points in the fourth quarter, Moschetti, who was virtually nonexistent in the first three quarters, crawled out from the rock he was under and nearly made K-State's dreams of a Big 12 Championship berth come true.

Moschetti was as good and as smooth as mashed potatoes and gravy (with candied yams, fresh rolls and pumpkin pie for dessert, of course), engineering a six-minute, three-touchdown, and two-heart-attacks' worth of a comeback.

Moschetti's masterpiece, one touchdown coming after a crucial elbow injury, wasn't enough as kicker Jeremy Aldrich, who probably will be mauled before the week is over, missed a chip-shot field goal with one second remaining on the clock.

You know what happened next. Nebraska's Dan Alexander bulled his way into the end zone for his fourth touchdown of the day, giving Nebraska the overtime victory and ending K-State's dream.

Still, Moschetti should be given the Thanksgiving medal of honor for his bravery and courage when it seemed as if his team was finished. Performances like Moschetti's are what make the holidays worthwhile.

Reason 2: Texas at Texas A&M

The courageous Aggies also made an amazing comeback. But their comeback wasn't for them or the football community, it was for the entire Texas A&M faithful.

Just eight days after 12 students died in a tragic accident, the Aggies overcame their sadness and did the only thing that could bring a little bit of joy to the hearts in College Station, Texas.

Quarterback Randy McCown hit tight end Matt Bumgardner with five minutes to go to give Texas A&M a 20-16 victory over archrival Texas at Kyle Field.

"We were predestined to win this game," cornerback Jason Webster said.

Even though it was just a victory in an amazing, competitive football game, it meant so much more. It gave the entire community hope in a time when giving up seemed the only option.

"I think what this game says the most about our team is that we are fighters," fullback Ja'Mar Toombs said. "We had to really play hard to win. We're not quitters, and we're not going to just lie down."

They didn't. After upsetting K-State in the Big 12 Championship game in 1998 to cap off an amazing 11-3 season, Texas A&M has been climbing an uphill battle in 1999.

Besides battling injuries and disappointing losses to Texas Tech and Oklahoma, the Aggies have been attempting to overcome sadness from day one. Coach R.C. Slocum's son underwent heart surgery in April; in June, quarterback coach Ray Dorr was diagnosed with Lou Gehrig's disease.

Then, 12 students died and 27 people were injured when a 40-foot stack of logs collapsed Nov. 18, crushing them as they worked on the traditional pregame bonfire.

But the Aggies overcame and made Thanksgiving more than just a time for stuffing your face full of turkey and pecan pie.

Moschetti's performance and the Aggies' "never say die" attitude brings out what the holiday season is all about.

Although football games can't really relate to being with your family and giving to the needy, these games prove that success can come to those who might be least likely to get it.

These games prove that if you want anything bad enough and are willing to fight for it, then coming back from defeat can be as easy and gratifying as dipping your spoon into a heaping dish of cranberry sauce.

Nebraska expected to try for big victory

BY JIM VERTUNO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AUSTIN, Texas — It's not as if Nebraska doesn't have enough reason to beat Texas for the Big 12 Conference title.

A Cornhuskers' victory would snap a three-game losing streak to the Longhorns and would give No. 3 Nebraska (10-1, 7-1 Big 12) its first league title since 1997.

Most importantly, a big victory Saturday in San Antonio could vault Nebraska past No. 2 Virginia Tech in the complicated BCS ratings and into the Sugar Bowl to play top-ranked Florida State.

Nebraska will try not only to win, but win big, Texas coach Mack Brown said Sunday.

"They're trying to get into the national championship, so I'm sure they'll try to beat us by 100," Brown said Sunday.

There were other times when Nebraska was supposed to win big only to get stopped cold by Texas (9-3, 6-2). The Longhorns are the only team to beat Nebraska three times in the 1990s.

The first time was in the 1996 Big 12 title game, when Texas upended the two-time defending national champions 37-27. The Longhorns followed that

Sold-out show to feature West African choreography by visiting artist

Tickets are scarce for WinterDance '99, an annual production courtesy of the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance.

In fact, a waiting list in McCain box office now is used to determine the people who will be able to attend one of the performances planned for this weekend.

"These tickets are like gold," said Joyce Yagerline, assistant professor of dance and production coordinator for the event.

Planning for WinterDance '99, which will take place Thursday through Saturday in Nichols Theatre, began in early September, when dance faculty members held auditions open to all K-State students. Hopeful participants were shown movements that would be included in the event to determine how well dancers would handle certain styles of dance.

"Each choreographer gives them a certain movement to perform," said Vera Orlock, associate professor of dance and a choreographer for the show.

Orlock said her portion of the program, "Forces of Nature," incorporates improvisational dance, giving WinterDance attendees a different performance each evening of the event.

"I give the dancers a structure before they go on stage, and they make it up as they go along," Orlock said. "You never get the same thing twice."

Yagerline's part of the production, "And Time Will Shimmy," will be set to music from the movie "Kundun," the story of the Dalai Lama's flight from Tibet. The piece is divided into four sections: a solo, a trio, a duet, and a corps of dancers, which will feature the manadala, a dance that forms a circle within a circle.

"I wanted an austere feeling, something that's not flowery and not soft, to go with the chanting. I didn't want Easter egg pastels."

— Joyce Yagerline, assistant professor of dance

The dark coloring of the costumes for the piece helped add atmosphere, Yagerline said.

"I wanted an austere feeling, something that's not flowery and not soft, to go with the chanting," she said. "I didn't want Easter egg pastels."

WinterDance '99 also will feature the choreography of guest artist Deidre Dawkins, a graduate of New York University's Tisch School of the Arts. Dawkins, who first visited Manhattan in 1996 as a guest artist to help instruct, left an impression with K-State dance instructors.

"We enjoyed her choreography and her energy so much that we invited her back," Yagerline said.

Dawkins' specialty is West African dance, a fast-paced, barefoot style led by drummers.

"The dancing is close to the earth, and very quick-footed," Yagerline said. "It's really tied into the music. The drummer really leads it."

WinterDance '99 begins at 8 p.m. Thursday through Saturday, with a special matinee performance at 2 p.m. Saturday. For information regarding the waiting list for the event, contact the McCain box office at 532-6428.

Dancers chosen for intensive summer study in New York

BY SHANNON DELMEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four K-State student dancers have made the leap from Nichols Hall to the dance studios of New York City.

They will spend this summer in New York City at the prestigious Alvin Ailey American Dance Center's Summer Intensive.

Melanie Furjanic, senior in theater; Courtney Pralle, junior in theater; Tatum Tabor, junior in theater; and Erinn Thompson, freshman in theater, were chosen, among 12 other dancers, at the company's Nov. 6 audition in Kansas City, Mo.

"They do an audition in just about every major city there is, and they only take a few from each," said Wanda Ebright, assistant professor of dance and the students' instructor. "Alvin Ailey is a major modern dance company and is internationally renowned. This summer program is one of the most prestigious ones in the country, and people come from all over the world to do the summer intensive."

The eight-week long program gives dancers an opportunity to focus on their dance studies, Ebright said.

"They mega-intensify it," she said. "You're taking three or four classes a day, and each class is an hour and a half to two hours long. So you're just dancing all day long every day."

The students will be required to take ballet classes and two different types of modern dance, which will focus on the Graham and Horton techniques. These classes will be taken daily. The rest of their classes will be chosen from a list of electives, which include pointe, jazz, African, tap, hip-hop, Caribbean, West Indian, Spanish and even yoga.

"It's a higher level of dance training than we are used to," Thompson said.

The students will have the chance to work with professionals at the end of their eight weeks.

"They have a showcase concert at the end of the summer where they have several famous choreographers come in and make up dances," Ebright said.

An honor like this doesn't come along every day. Compared to other cities, the Kansas City region audition accepted a high number, Ebright said.

Having four of those from K-State is even more of an honor. Only one other dancer from K-State ever has been chosen to study at the Alvin Ailey school, she said.

"Alvin Ailey is such an esteemed dance group in America that just being chosen to dance with the Alvin Ailey teachers and other dancers from their company, and to take classes over the summer, is like going to the Super Bowl," Thompson said. "It's so amazing. It's like a dream. It's just the best."

Ebright said she and the dancers did a lot of mental preparing to be ready for the audition.

"We did some intensive preparing and talking for two or three weeks," she said. "Talking about making sure their résumés were together and making sure they knew audition etiquette. Making sure they knew to be on time, what to wear and how their hair should be. And if they didn't have a good photo or headshot, how to get one. Because a lot of times people know how to dance, but they don't know how to take an audition well, and that may be the reason that they don't accept too many."

Ebright said this program will allow the students to grow and become stronger as dancers and help the emerging K-State dance program to grow as well.

"While they're in New York, the things that they learn will change," she said. "People will start to ask, 'Where do you study?' because they are so prepared and professional. I think more people are going to want to come here.

This program is going to grow a lot. They'll also come back with all that training, which is going to excite us as choreographers. They'll be so much stronger. They're going to grow, and that's going to make us grow more."

Thompson said she is excited to get that chance.

"It's a really big honor to be chosen to go," she said.

'The Green Mile' lengthy, yet worth time investment

BY KEN WELLS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There are several fringe benefits to being a college student, and those who stayed on campus last Tuesday night were able to indulge in one: A sneak peek of the latest film adaptation of a Stephen King novel, "The Green Mile," starring Tom Hanks.

Movie Review

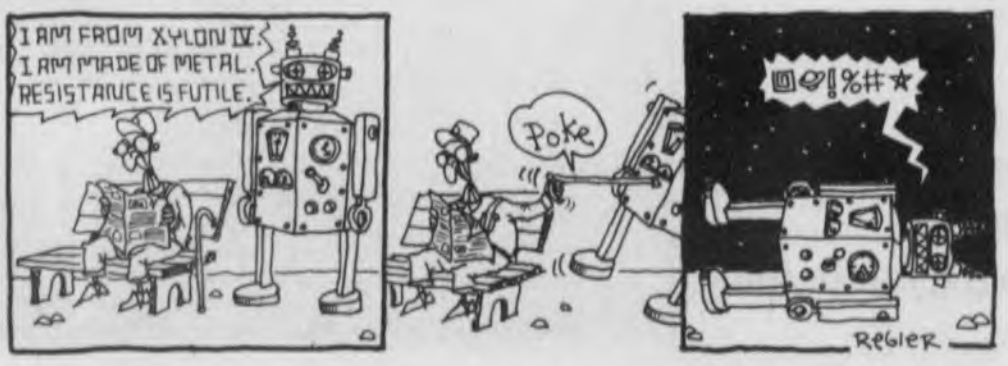
OUT OF 5

"The Green Mile"

Caveats out of the way first: The screening was courtesy of the Union Program Council, part of a network feed to several dozen campuses and emceed by an astonishingly oblivious woman whose idea of a "moment of silence" included her babbling about the moment's significance. But those who were able to weather the previews, corporate shilling and utter vacuity of the hostess were in for a treat, albeit a very long treat.

"The Green Mile" inevitably will be compared to "The Shawshank Redemption" through the two umbilicals of the creative team (writer Stephen King and co-writer/director Frank Darabont) and the prison setting. However, this time it's the guard's story. Paul Edgecomb (Hanks) is the head guard on a Southern prison's death row (the titular "green mile") in 1935 when he meets a new prisoner, John Coffey (Michael Duncan, Bear from "Armageddon"), a hulking but gentle goliath accused in the gruesome murder of two young girls.

It takes awhile for "Mile's" first clear distinction from "Shawshank" to become obvious. Whereas "Shawshank" created a gritty, realistic environment and stuck to it, the audience is waist-deep in "Mile" before it's hit with a plot twist that pokes a great big hole in that realism; it's a credit to the cast and crew (for its simple, natural design and cinematography) that the realism doesn't shatter altogether. Hanks anchors a rock-solid acting corps featuring David Morse ("Contact," "The Rock"), James Cromwell ("Babe," "Star Trek: First Contact"), Michael Jeter (yes, that Michael Jeter) and Harry Dean Stanton, and they're utterly engaging.



Duncan, however, is the real story. He's a former gas-company employee following an acting dream, and this might be his storybook Oscar vehicle. He seizes the screen every time he appears (and not just because he's 6 feet five inches and built like a Coke machine, either). Coffey's character is simultaneously simple and vulnerable, and Duncan nails those aspects of his character with subtle voice inflections and gentle body language. Coffey's not a Forrest Gump, and Duncan's not Hanks; he pegs this character and makes him unique.

How sad, then, that we don't see enough of Coffey. We see a lot of the guards, of the other prisoners, of the boom mike threatening to bop Cromwell on the head in his office. The part that astonishes me about Coffey's relatively little screen time is the fact that this movie is three. Hours. Long.

Some movies I can sit through for three hours, but "The Green Mile" feels done just after its second hour. This "Mile" threatens to never end. An overlong (but touching) epilogue is horridly paced, and there probably are a few scenes that could be axed for brevity's sake.

But this merely is too much of a good thing; this film is a treat to watch, even in its distractions and meanderings. Humorous and emotional but certainly not for the kids, "The Green Mile" is an endurance test worth taking.

AMNESTY

After explaining the group's cause to principal Sylvester Benson, Oviatt was able to get the idea of wearing gay rights T-shirts approved.

"We had already decided we were going to wear T-shirts," Oviatt said. "We're not doing it as a protest, but as a positive action."

Although Lilly Sanders, vice president of the Amnesty group, said a few people made jokes about the shirts, she said they received a positive response.

"I don't think there was really anything offensive about the shirts," Sanders said. "By having so many people wear them, it gave a more personable message."

Oviatt said one of the objectives of the campaign is to learn what policy the district has towards homosexual harassment.

"I don't think there is a policy for students not to use derogatory terms," Oviatt said. "This is of equal importance as racial slurs."

Sanders said the Amnesty group has done well this year, but its main goal eventually will be to form a gay-straight alliance. In addition, Sanders said the group still is selling shirts and will continue to wear them.

"The T-shirts make a physical statement about how many people are willing to stand up for this issue," Oviatt said. "Our main goal will be to establish a gay-straight alliance or similar support group within the school."

the Cats finished 13th at nationals. This year's finish surpasses the 1985 squad's seventh-place showing at the NCAA meet.

"We all believed we could have a top-five finish, and we did it," Wetterhus said. "I'm so happy. It's amazing how far this program has come since I was a freshman. It says a lot about our heart, program and team."

Junior Jean-Paul Niyongabo raced on the men's side, placing 105th.

"It was a fast field from the beginning, and I was not able to move out," Niyongabo said. "I moved up a little around 8,000 meters and passed a few who started too fast, but it was just too late."

with a 20-16 win in 1998, Brown's first season at Texas, to snap the Huskers' 47-game home winning streak.

Nebraska came to Austin this year looking for revenge but saw a 13-3 lead evaporate into a 24-20 Texas victory.

Brown, who has never coached a rematch in the same season, said too much is on the line to get caught up in history.

"Both teams will be ready to play, because it's a one-game shot at the conference championship," Brown said. "The coaches already know each other, the players already know each other, and all the pregame talk has been used up."

Texas, which three times this season rallied to victory on its way to the Big 12 South Division title, watched Texas A&M come from behind Friday for a 20-16 win.

Texas took a 16-6 lead behind freshman quarterback Chris Simms, only to watch A&M score the winning touchdown with 5:02 left on a 14-yard TD catch by Matt Bumgardner.

Simms — starting in place of Major Applewhite, who was battling stomach flu — finished 10-of-21 for 130 yards and played better than Brown expected. The rest of the team didn't do enough to win, the coach said.

"He was devastated after the game because he thought his performance hurt us," Brown said. "On the contrary, I thought Chris gave us a chance to hang in there and a chance to win the game."

TRADE

greed and corporate profits above human rights.

Buchanan denounced the administration for agreeing to support China's entry into the WTO in return for reduced Chinese trade barriers. U.S. farmers and manufacturers long have complained that those barriers are costing them billions of dollars in lost sales each year.

"This was a complete and total giveaway," Buchanan said. "We got nothing in the way of human rights improvement, nothing in the way of a build-down of the missiles aimed at Taiwan, nothing in the way of reduced belligerence for this country."

The formal four days of WTO discussions are aimed at starting what some are calling the Millennium Round of trade negotiations, a follow-up to the Uruguay Round of trade talks completed in 1993.

The formal discussions do not get under way until Tuesday. But already thousands of officials from the 135 WTO member countries and 30 more observer nations were filling the hotel rooms and holding informal meetings in an effort to win converts for their negotiating positions.

The city was planning to spend $6 million on security for the event, which could attract more than 50,000 demonstrators who see the Geneva-based WTO as the embodiment of everything that is wrong with globalization.

President Clinton, who will address the WTO sessions Wednesday, has sought to address the concerns of critics by pushing for the WTO to consider labor standards and environmental protections when it negotiates new trade agreements.

But the U.S. effort is being resisted strongly by developing countries. They see the introduction of these issues as a veiled attempt by rich nations to take away the advantages poor countries enjoy with lower wages and less stringent environmental rules.

Also, the 15-nation European Union is resisting demands from the United States for a full-scale assault agriculture trade barriers, insisting it has the right to protect its thousands of small family farms.

U.S. Trade Representative Charlene Barshefsky is insisting that the United States will not give in to demands by Japan and many developing nations. They want new rules that would restrict the United States from using its laws to penalize imports judged to be entering the United States at unfairly low prices.

After months of closed-door talks in Geneva, trade negotiators last week gave up on efforts to hammer out the document needed to establish the format for the talks. They left it up to their bosses, the trade ministers, to resolve the disputes in Seattle.

Outside the giant convention center where the talks will get started on Tuesday, protesters already were busily engaged in a series of teach-ins, street theatre and other activities.

Some groups even held training sessions this summer to teach demonstrators how to scale buildings and bridges with their giant banners. The protesters have adopted as their rallying cry, "Stop Global Piracy with Global Solidarity, The Battle in Seattle — International Days of Action."

Kansas church burns to ground Friday night

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SALINA, Kan. — The St. John's Missionary Baptist Church burned to the ground Friday night, but the fire could not quench the spirit of the congregation.

The 225 members of the oldest and largest black church in Salina worshiped at the 4-H building at Kenwood Park this week.

"God has a plan in this that we don't see," Pastor Allen D. Smith said. "It's critical that we focus on the positive. No life was taken. There are a lot of positive things on which we will focus. It will be a rallying point for the church."

The building itself was 74 years old. But the congregation began 120 years ago, when 30 former slaves began having services in a dugout on North Second Street.

Investigators from the federal Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms and the Kansas fire marshal's office are assisting the Salina fire and police departments in the investigation.

The wall must be dismantled before it is safe for investigators to go inside, Larry Scott said, with the Kansas City ATF office.

The investigation should resume today.

"They look for electrical or gas problems, the weather, and find out what witnesses saw — any suspicious activity around the time of the fire," Scott said.

There is no suspicion of foul play. The bureau aids investigations into church fires routinely since a presidential mandate three years ago.

The fire smoldered Saturday in the remains of the building. Only the front and back walls were left standing.

There are few documents from the church's early history. Most of the first members were prohibited from learning to read and write. Later records and photographs stored in the basement were lost in the fire.

Salina Fire Chief Tom Girard said all on- and off-duty firefighters were used to fight the flames, which at times reached almost 50 feet high.

Girard said that minutes after firefighters started working on the blaze, an explosion from inside the building pushed out the front door and windows.

The explosion's force hurled Lt. Willis Sutton and firefighter Sarah Beem about 20 feet from the church, Sutton said. At the same time, a south wall crumbled and buried firefighter Jerry Short in bricks.

Sutton and Beem were treated for first-, second- and third-degree burns. Short was rescued by his colleagues and hospitalized for treatment of a punctured right lung and three fractured right ribs. He was released Saturday afternoon.

"I turned to run, but there was no time to get out," Short said. "It all started coming down on me. I kept thinking, 'Man, it's got to stop.' Thank God that it did."

The building itself was 74 years old. But the congregation began 120 years ago, when 30 former slaves began having services in a dugout on North Second Street.

The church will use insurance money to rebuild on the site, Smith, the pastor, said.

The two church vans crushed from falling debris also need to be replaced. Until new vans are purchased, church members will pick up those who need transportation.

They weren't the only things the blaze consumed. Valuable pieces used in worship are gone. In the sanctuary, there were antique chandeliers, said congregation historian Barbara Knight. There was a 25-year-old Hammond organ, along with a keyboard, drum set and choir robes.

Terrorist bombing injures at least 43 in South Africa

BY ANDREW SELSKY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — A pipe bomb exploded inside a crowded beachfront restaurant Sunday, injuring at least 43 people, police said. The blast near Cape Town came just weeks after police in the area all but declared victory in a war against terrorist bombings.

In a flash, a lazy weekend afternoon at a scenic cove turned into a nightmare, with the injured crawling through debris and pools of blood in the St. Elmo's pizza restaurant in Camps Bay, just south of Cape Town.

Police Capt. Neville Malila told The Associated Press by telephone that the pipe bomb was placed under a table inside the restaurant and that at least 43 people were injured. A 4-year-old girl's foot was injured so severely that it had to be amputated, the South African Press Association reported.

No one immediately claimed responsibility for the bombing, which resembled an unsolved attack on another high-profile tourist target: the August 1998 bombing of a Planet Hollywood restaurant at Cape Town's fashionable waterfront which killed two people and injured 26. A pipe bomb was used in that attack as well.

Some of the victims' limbs were blown off in the Camps Bay bombing, Provincial Security Minister Mark Wiley said in a TV report that included footage of a person writhing on the sidewalk with a severed foot.

Wiley said police must be given blanket powers by the government to apprehend all suspects to prevent the attacks from wrecking the tourist industry in Western Cape province, a top money-earner.

"The very economy of the Western Cape is at stake if they do not give us that capacity," Wiley said.

Internet companies help push average Super Bowl ad prices near $2 million

BY SKIP WOLLENBERG
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Some Internet companies are paying more to advertise on January's Super Bowl telecast than they have generated in revenue, helping push the average commercial price for the game to a record of about $2 million.

As many as a dozen "dot-com" advertisers are expected to rub shoulders with Anheuser-Busch, Pepsi-Cola, Federal Express, Visa and other longtime Super Bowl advertisers on the Jan. 30 telecast on ABC.

Dot-com advertisers have bought about 20 percent of the available commercials in the Super Bowl, industry insiders estimated.

Price evidently has been no object as industry insiders say the average charge for a 30-second Super Bowl commercial has soared 25 percent from the old high of $1.6 million on the last NFL championship game broadcast. Super Bowl ad prices are typically the highest on TV.

Marvin Goldsmith, ABC's head of sales and marketing, declined to comment on the prices but said sales have been helped by a strong economy and advertisers' renewed appreciation of broadcast TV's ability to reach a huge audience quickly.

The Super Bowl attracts the biggest TV ratings of the year while at the same time the broadcast networks' audiences have steadily eroded.

"There are very few of these platform events that offer the opportunity to reach the masses in a concise period," said Bob Flood, who oversees national TV ad purchases made by DeWitt Media in New York.

Online marketers especially want to use the Super Bowl as "a showpiece for their Internet address and to say to the world that 'we are playing with the big boys,'" said Bill Croasdale, a top commercial buyer at Western Initiative Media in Los Angeles.

But paying more for a 30-second commercial than you have generated in sales is a bold move even at a time when excess is the norm.

"We have not generated a dime yet," conceded Ethan Russman, marketing director of Angeltips.com, which is paying $2 million for Super Bowl exposure with start-up money it raised from investors, mostly from Europe and Asia.

Russman compared Angeltips.com to a dating service, saying it matches entrepreneurs with investors looking for new business concepts. He said the exposure from two commercials during the game and a pregame show should build credibility and trust for the company.

"There is nothing else in the advertising and marketing world that matches the Super Bowl," he said.

Computer.com, a 5-month-old Internet company, is spending about $3 million for a package that includes one commercial during the game and two in pregame shows.

The Maynard, Mass.-based company, dedicated to educating and advising computer novices on what to buy, has generated less than $500,000 in revenue to date.

"If I had to spend 10 times that ($3 million) amount, I could still probably rationalize the return," said Michael Zapolin, chief executive of Computer.com.

Another new Super Bowl sponsor is Ourbeginning.com, an online stationery store that specializes in wedding invitations, birth announcements and notices of "other significant life events."

The company, founded in March in Orlando, Fla., expects to generate less than $1 million in revenue during its first year, chief executive and founder Michael Budowski said.

He said it is spending $3.5 million to $4 million for one commercial during the Super Bowl, four before the game and an exclusive sponsorship of a 30-minute pregame program.

The chance to reach close to 100 million viewers so quickly makes it worthwhile, he said.

"One of the things with the Internet is that everyone is vying for position," he said.

Two online job sites, Monster.com and Hotjobs.com, are back for this Super Bowl after advertising last year.

Russian forces seek to cut off supplies to Grozny

BY RUSLAN MUSAYEV
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GROZNY, Russia — Russian tanks and infantry backed by warplanes fought Sunday to cut off the last supply route between Grozny and the rest of rebel-controlled Chechnya, clashing for hours with about 500 militants.

Russian ground troops were battling the rebels for control of the road between Grozny, the Chechen capital, and the city of Urus-Martan, 12 miles southwest of Grozny. Russian Mi-24 helicopters and fighter jets fired at rebel positions while tanks rolled across the surrounding plain.

However, the Russians' advance was slow because the military command — seeking to avoid the kind of heavy losses suffered in ground battles during the previous, 1994-96 Chechnya war — pulled troops back every time they encountered heavy resistance.

Zelimkhan Shimayev, a Chechen fighter who took part in Sunday's fighting, acknowledged that the rebels suffered some serious hits by federal forces. But he said the Russians were badly organized and were having trouble seizing the section of road closest to Urus-Martan.

Russian warplanes and artillery also battered Urus-Martan itself, largely destroying the center of the city and setting off several fires.

The Russian military has denied it plans to storm Grozny, and instead is seeking to cut it off from supplies and reinforcements while hammering it with air and artillery strikes to wipe out or drive out militants holed up in the city.

Russian warplanes on Saturday bombed the Argun Gorge southeast of Grozny — another route along which the militants were believed to be moving supplies, weapons and reinforcements to the embattled capital, the Russian military said Sunday, according to the Interfax news agency.

Meanwhile, Russian officials announced Sunday they were offering the few civilians left in Grozny safe passage out through a special corridor. Warplanes have been dropping leaflets on the city advertising the offer, Deputy Prime Minister Nikolai Koshman said on Russia's NTV television.

Russia's ferocious bombing of Grozny prompted a counteroffensive by rebels on Saturday — the first major raid since Russia's military ground operation began in September.

Fighters led by field commander Salman Raduyev stormed the town of Novogroznensky, 25 miles east of Grozny, and claimed to have taken control of most of the town Saturday.

Hale officials explore options to increase funding for library

■ Research materials top list of priorities; Pepsi deal puts library closer to goal.

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

University officials maintain that K-State's top priority in the new decade is improving the research materials available at Hale Library.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said the university is in the midst of increasing library funding. He said he is exploring all potential funding options.

"I am turning over rocks, looking for ways to enhance the library and areas of funding," Hobrock said.

Marion Gray, Faculty Senate president, said that in the next 10 years, the university wants to make great strides in its volume of research materials.

Gray said the university has four areas from which to gather funding. Among them is an endowment fund. The goal of the endowment fund is to raise $10 million in the next 10 years.

As a result of the recent drink contract the university signed with Pepsi Cola, the endowment is now about 70-percent complete. The contract allocated $5 million to the library, and the allotment will be paid out over 10 years.

At the press conference announcing the signing of the contract, President Jon Wefald said the contract benefits the library greatly.

"Today we can say that we're close to 70 percent on the road to that library endowment, and to me that's great news," Wefald said. "We have a beautiful new library, but as you all know, we need the funding within Brice Hobrock's operating budget to buy the subscriptions and monographs to make our library a great library."

Hobrock said he is continuing to look for further funding. After the first of the year he plans to meet with Microsoft Corp. officials. He said a meeting was scheduled with officials from Microsoft earlier this month, but the U.S. Department of Justice released its finding of fact against Microsoft the day before the scheduled meeting. As a result, Hobrock said the meeting was postponed and probably will be rescheduled for February.

Other areas the library is looking to use for funding are research overhead funds, student funds and state money, Gray said.

Last year, a $1 per-credit-hour increase was agreed upon to fund Hale. The funds could have been matched by state funds, but in the governor's recent proposed budget announcement, there are no matching funds.

"We hoped that the state would match it, but there just wasn't the money in the budget this year," Wefald said. "Other years they might match it."

The four areas that increase library funding could help to make the university libraries a member of the Association of Research Libraries. Gray said being a member of ARL is a long-term goal.

He said it is difficult to set an exact timetable on becoming a member of the association.

"It is hard to do anything other than speculate on it," Gray said. "My speculation is it probably won't happen in five years, but I would hope it would happen in 10 years."

Gray also said during that time the criteria and standards for ARL might change to account for materials that are available electronically.

Martha Kyrillidou, senior program officer for statistics and management with ARL, said the association is establishing a standing committee to make sure its standards remain relevant.

"We are putting together a standing committee on the qualitative process developed to show how we need to modify our membership requirements to suit our environment," Kyrillidou said.

On the ARL Web site listed under requirements, it states that libraries are judged on a variety of criteria, such as the number of volumes they have, volumes added every year, total expenditures and a variety of other things.

Gray said that while being a member of ARL is important, other things are more important.

"ARL standards are only a marker by which to go on," Gray said. "What we want is a good library."

The university has faced an uphill battle in its quest to become a top library, Gray said.

"It is a historic problem that stems from the fact that K-State was not always a comprehensive university," Gray said.

Gray also said the university has been working to improve for quite some time as a result of becoming a comprehensive university later than other universities.

"We started behind and have never caught up," Gray said.

Today, the university is looking to catch up.

Hobrock has been at the university for more than 17 years, and in that time a new library has been produced. He is playing a role in increasing the information available in the library.

"I am going to retire in a few years, and already we have built a building, but now we are working to see greater financial stability at the end of my career," Hobrock said.

CATCHING UP

In the race to become a top university library, K-State's Hale Library continues to fall behind in the funding category. Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock continues to search several avenues to increase funding and put K-State in competition with other libraries. Hobrock looks to increase the budget to more than $2.4 million in the 2000-01 school year, possibly from the following sources.

1. Endowment fund
- Pepsi Cola ($5 million)
- Microsoft Corp.

2. Research overhead funds

3. Student funds
- $1 per-credit-hour privilege fee

4. State funds

Commission elects acting city manager

By TANNER EHMKE
Kansas State Collegian

City commissioners voted unanimously to name Assistant City Manager Ron Fehr as acting city manager in a special meeting Monday. City Manager Gary Greer submitted his resignation Nov. 23.

Greer has accepted an offer to become vice president of Manhattan's Steel and Pipes Supply Co. Although the commissioners were unhappy to see Greer resign, they were pleased to see him stay in Manhattan.

"I was unsettled when he told me he was going to leave," said Mayor Roger Reitz. "He's been a light to the city of Manhattan. We feel fortunate he will stay in Manhattan."

Commissioner Karen McCulloh described Greer as a desirable commodity. It was a disappointment that he resigned, she said. But she said she is delighted he's staying in the community.

The move was good for himself and his family, Greer said. Deciding to stay in Manhattan was not a difficult decision. Manhattan is a good place for his children to grow up, he said.

"I'm happy to stay in Manhattan," he

Contest starts today to name store in Union

By CHRISTINA HOGGATT
Kansas State Collegian

A naming contest begins today for the new retail shop opening next semester in the K-State Student Union.

"This contest is real exciting," said Union marketing and promotions manager Cindie Snyder. "It will give a K-State student a perfect chance to leave their mark and legacy by naming a place on campus."

■ MORE INFO?
Students wishing to enter the contest can pick up entry forms at any cash register in the Union until 11:30 a.m. Dec. 6. The entry form must be returned to the Director's Office, K-State Student Union 220, Manhattan, KS 66506. For more information, call (785) 532-5753.

The contest will run today through Dec. 6 and is open to all K-State students. The winner will receive a $250 Student Union Gift Card and will participate in the store's grand opening.

Though many students are excited about the opportunity to win the gift card, there are other reasons to enter the contest.

"I would enter because it would be fun," Jon Selisker, junior in advertising, Committee recommends transportation system

18-month study rejects plan for parking garage, offers alternative solutions to deal with problem

By TIM RICHARDSON
Kansas State Collegian

Plans to construct a parking garage are being tossed aside in favor of a transit system that would benefit the city of Manhattan and the university.

Findings from an 18-month study concluded the city and university should work together in developing an area transportation system. The Transportation Study Sub-Committee of the Campus Development Committee said at the annual fall forum on Capital Projects and Planning that a public transit system is the most popular solution to alleviate parking problems.

"Every group involved in the process came to the conclusion that a shuttle bus system is the way to go," sub-committee chairwoman Rita Newell said.

Other alternatives include relying on parking management, which would discourage core campus use and bring minimal cost increases. According to TranSystems Corporation of Kansas City, Mo., which developed seven options to address campus transportation, this option would apply space-management techniques to use existing parking.

Another option includes construction of a parking garage. A garage at the K-State Student Union that would bring 500 additional parking spaces to campus would cost nearly $1.4 million through 20 years.

A proposed parking garage north of Waters Hall or Durland Hall would net 700 additional spaces at a cost of nearly $1.7 million through 20 years. Newell said the project will be more economical with input from K-State and local government.

"We hope the university will want to do this in conjunction with the city of Manhattan," Newell said.

Three available options include implementing a shuttle bus service.

The remote parking with shuttle bus service option would likely use existing space at Bramlage Coliseum or the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex for parking and bring riders to the core of campus.

The Bramlage lot is owned by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. User fees would be necessary because the lot is funded by revenues from athletic events and is maintained by the athletic department.

Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning, said constructing additional parking lots allows less space for other campus additions.

"We have a finite amount of space on this campus," he said. "Do we continue to sprawl or do we improve the density of the interior of campus? That is a planning issue that will affect the look and feel of this campus significantly."

An intra-campus shuttle bus and a shuttle bus that would service neighborhoods surrounding the university are also proposed.

New projects and project updates also were discussed. Fiedler Hall, which is the final phase of the Durland Hall complex construction, will be completed in June 2000. The building will house the civil engineering department, and will include an auditorium and an electronic library.

An $11.4 million addition to Ackert Hall will add 70,000 square feet to the building, with the project to be completed in nearly two years. Renovations will also continue at the Union with the construction of a Starbucks, which includes tearing down the walls near Commerce Bank.

Construction also will begin on the Alumni Center near the intersection of Anderson Avenue and 17th Street in fall 2000, and graduating seniors can purchase a granite block with their name and degree that will be used to construct a wall near 17th Street. Names of additional graduates will be added to the wall each year.

Developmentally disabled continue to await services

TOPEKA — Despite the addition of nearly $6 million to address the problem, the number of developmentally disabled Kansans waiting for services remains about the same.

Auditors presented their findings today to the Legislative Post Audit Committee. As of June 30, about 500 people — or about 7 percent of those seeking services — were waiting for some type of service.

Of those waiting, 214 were receiving some, but not all, of the services they requested. Another 300 didn't get any services. By Oct. 28, the number of people waiting who were not receiving any services had increased to 314.

Former Board of Agriculture president dead at age 103

RICHMOND, Kan. — Harold E. Staadt, former president of the state Board of Agriculture and a pioneer in the growth of hybrid seed corn, has died. He was 103.

Staadt died Sunday at Ransom Memorial Hospital in Ottawa.

He was a member of the agriculture board for 24 years, serving two terms as president. He also was a member of the State Fair Board of Managers.

He was a member of the board of directors of the Kansas Crop Improvement Association and helped form the Kansas Hybrid Corn Association, serving as president of each group for two terms.

Staadt was survived by his wife, Olive; a son, Harold Jr.; and two grandsons.

Radio host gets suspension for Jesse Jackson remarks

TOLEDO, Ohio — A radio talk-show host began a week-long suspension Monday for telling his listeners the Rev. Jesse Jackson wanted to get assassinated.

"There is a limit to what we will allow on the public airwaves," said Andy Stuart, vice president and market manager for Clear Channel Communications Inc., which suspended WSPD-AM radio host Scott Sloan without pay.

Sloan's comments angered religious and city leaders, but Stuart said that while Sloan was not trying to incite violence, his comments were totally inappropriate and outside the bounds of good taste.

Sloan's phone number was unlisted, and he could not be reached to comment.

During his three-hour show on Nov. 17, Sloan said Jackson intervened in a Decatur, Ill., dispute to be a martyr like the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., who died April 4, 1968, after he was shot while standing on the balcony of the Lorraine Motel in Memphis, Tenn.

Sloan called the Lorraine Hotel in Miami, Fla., asking if the rooms had balconies.

"All we need now is a shooter," he said on the air.

Coca-Cola pulls advertising from WWF after complaints

ATLANTA — Coca-Cola has stopped spending its advertising money on the World Wrestling Federation's telecasts, citing often lewd language and story lines.

Coke's action follows a campaign against the WWF by the conservative Parents Television Council, but a company spokesman said Monday that was not the only reason it pulled the advertising.

The Atlanta-based company continues to advertise with WWF's main rival, World Championship Wrestling, a subsidiary of Time Warner's Turner Broadcasting System, also based in Atlanta.

Coke ended its two-year advertising relationship with the WWF the week of Oct. 18.

"It crossed the line in terms of content, particularly in terms of language and story lines," Coke spokesman Bob Bertini said, refusing to discuss any specifics. "It's not about wrestling. Specifically, it's about the WWF's programming content."

WWF Chairman Vince McMahon blasted Coke's decision as discriminatory, hypocritical, and an affront to free speech.

The WWF said the commercial time dropped by Coke was replaced immediately by advertisers at premium rates.

Bertini would not say how much Coke spent on its wrestling marketing.

Bertini said Coke had received letters from people affiliated with the council but that those did not solely influence the decision on the WWF.

Bertini said Coke did not have the same content issues with the WCW.

Turkey announces 2-hour power cuts to save energy

ANKARA, Turkey — Turkey will cut the power supply to the capital for two hours a day to save energy because of a drop in the supply of natural gas from Russia, officials said Monday.

The state pipeline company BOTAS said that due to freezing weather in Russia and Ukraine, Moscow has been able to supply Turkey with only 700 million cubic feet of gas per day, down from 945 million cubic feet per day.

That and the need for gas to heat homes in central Turkey, which is facing bitter cold, have left power plants short of energy.

"Because of that situation, we have started previously unplanned power cuts to economize" on electricity, the Anatolia news agency quoted Muzaffer Selvi, head of the state-run electricity company, TEAS, as saying.

The power cuts to Ankara will end once natural gas supplies return to normal. The electricity shortage also has led to water shortages in the city since there is not enough electricity for water pumps.

Ex-employees sue Stallone, claim his rules were odious

MIAMI — Five former cooks and cleaners for Sylvester Stallone sued him Monday, claiming they were fired for breaking household rules that included not making eye contact with him or speaking to his mother.

The five, all temporary workers hired for 15 days in 1995, are seeking more than $1.5 million in damages. They said they were fired six days into their contracts.

They said they were told by Stallone's wife, Jennifer Flavin, they could be fired if they looked directly into the actor's eyes and were to back out and vanish immediately when Stallone entered a room at his former Miami estate.

They also were not to eat or drink anything from the house and were required to undergo daily searches, the lawsuit said. Housekeeperss were to check guests' suitcases to see if they took towels or silverware when leaving.

David Wild, a 1981 K-State graduate, shakes hands with Matthew Stoltz, freshman in computer engineering, after his speech, "Leadership Here and Beyond," Monday night.

Speaker says everyone has potential to become good leader

BY KATIE LAUX
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

David Wild believes leaders are made, not born.

Wild, a 1981 K-State graduate, spoke Monday in a speech titled "Leadership Here and Beyond," sponsored by the Apostolic Campus Ministry.

Wild, who works in acquisitions at Fort Riley and also offers leadership training to government representatives, said he attributes his beliefs to both his experience and his faith.

"I will challenge you and say, go within yourselves to find a greater appreciation for your role in society," Wild said.

He talked of the distinction between a managerial approach and a leadership approach. He made the distinction of how the two approaches often are thought of as one and the same, however, in his opinion, they are totally different.

"Managers care for the body of the organization. They make sure that all the resources are there, while leaders transcend that element and also care for the spirit. Exceptional leaders do both," Wild said.

Wild went on to talk of his experiences with other leaders and came to the conclusion that because all good leaders exhibit skills that can be learned, everyone can be leaders.

Thus, leaders are made not born.

Wild said there are two stages that a person goes through, often in a cycle. The stages are independence, often associated with the teen years, and interdependence, when people decides that they need others in their life.

"No one person is an island," Wild said.

He said people must understand the important fact that it takes followers to be a leader and that a good leader is a servant to those followers.

"It is the people being led that gives the power to the leader. We are here for the benefit of the followers."

— David Wild, 1981 K-State graduate

"It is the people being led that gives the power to the leader," he said. "We are here for the benefit of the followers."

Everyone can be a leader, he said, and leadership starts right now with each person as an individual.

On the topic of society as a whole, Wild said people are losing the ability to make meaning out of the values that once held our society together.

"Special interests and self-serving interests are emerging as the focal point in our society," Wild said.

He said the nation's youth are being raised with a value system that is inconsistent with the nation's leaders, and the principle behind leadership is maturity.

"We all have a leadership responsibility," he said. "We must be honest with ourselves."

In closing, Wild told the audience to be aware of their thoughts, because thoughts become words. He said to be aware of words, because words become actions.

Be aware of actions, because actions become habits.

Be aware of habits, because habits become one's character.

Be aware of character, because character determines one's destiny.

"He had a great message about leadership, some stuff that I already knew, but I gained some insight," Isabel Amaya, freshman in microbiology, said.

The Apostolic Campus Ministry meets every Monday and has individual Bible study available. It also offers a booth with informational materials every Monday located in the first floor of the K-State Student Union.

"We are so lucky to have Mr. Wild here with us," said Ana Rivera-Davila, Apostolic Campus Ministry president. "We needed someone who was an exemplary leader, and he is."

Disabled students to receive opportunity to study abroad

BY KEVIN SELDERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The opportunity for students to study abroad is becoming an equal one.

This year's Women's Studies Seminar in London will be one of the first programs of its kind to accommodate for disabled students. The study-abroad program will be taking its trip during spring break, March 18-26, 2000.

"I think this is very unique. Nobody has taken a group overseas that is accessible," said Elfrieda Nafziger, coordinator of group study from the office of international programs. "It could be the first in the nation as far as I know."

Torry Dickinson, associate professor of women's studies, started the seminar to London two years ago. After not being able to make the necessary accommodations for a disabled student in her class, Dickinson said she decided to change travel companies.

"When I see students in my class, I want all of them to come, and I want them to learn equally," Dickinson said.

With the help of Nafziger, Dickinson came across Accessible Journeys, a travel company that allows adults to travel abroad in small groups. They also provide buses with hydraulic lifts for people who use wheelchairs and work with wheelchair accessible hotels.

"No other travel company seems to be working with this," Dickinson said. "It's really shocking to me."

Although Accessible Journeys provides for disabled people, the seminar will be the first large group of students it takes overseas that is inclusive of disabled students.

Dickinson said she is looking forward to introducing more students to studying abroad.

"I just want to be able to support all students and give them what they want," she said. "This class is really designed to be open to all students interested in women's studies."

Dickinson said international issues are discussed in her women's studies class, and she said she believes studying abroad only can enhance what students learn.

"It's really important to connect with other women," she said. "We get to look at new ways of participating in politics and economics."

Nafziger, who has lived in such countries as Nigeria, India and Japan, also said there is much to gain from traveling abroad.

"I think we are better people when we get different perspectives," she said. "The U.S. isn't the only perspective."

Ashleigh Laham, senior in English who was part of the first trip to England, said she gained a lot from the trip.

"It was a really positive learning experience and growing experience for me, and it was my first time out of the U.S.," Laham said. "I met a lot of interesting people from all over Germany, Austria and France, and I still keep in touch with some of them."

Students interested in taking the trip can sign up at the Office of International Programs in Fairchild 304. The deadline to sign up is Dec. 6, and a $450 down-payment is required.

Laham said she strongly encourages students to study abroad and gain the same experience she has.

"Take advantage of the opportunities that K-State provides. Make the most of your time here," she said. "It's one of the best things I've done while at K-State."

Medical mistakes rampant, report says

BY LAUREN NEERGAARD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Medical mistakes kill anywhere from 44,000 to 98,000 hospitalized Americans a year, says a new report that calls the errors stunning and demands significant changes in the nation's health care system to protect patients.

The groundbreaking report by the Institute of Medicine says there are ways to prevent many of the mistakes and sets as a minimum goal a 50-percent reduction in medical errors within five years.

The problem is less a case of recklessness by individual doctors or nurses than it is the result of basic flaws in the way hospitals, clinics and pharmacies operate, the report says.

Doctors' notoriously poor handwriting too often leaves pharmacists squinting at tiny paper prescriptions. Did the doctor order 10 milligrams or 10 micrograms? Does the prescription call for the hormone replacement Premarin or the antibiotic Primaxin?

Too many drug names sound alike, causing confusion for doctor, nurse, pharmacist and patient alike. Consider the painkiller Celebrex and the anti-seizure drug Cerebyx, or Narcan, which treats morphine overdoses, and Norcuron, which can paralyze breathing muscles.

Crisis center's closing didn't need to happen

One of K-State and Manhattan's valuable resources just closed shop.

The FONE Crisis Center called it quits after 30 years of service last month. The center was Manhattan's only anonymous call-in service for people dealing with issues like suicide, relationships and sexuality. The phones were staffed 24 hours each day by volunteers.

Former director of the center, Carolyn McClaskey, said the problem was students and community members weren't using the service as often as in the past.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

Closing the crisis center, however, might not have been the right solution.

The center should have advertised better. A lot of students have never heard of the FONE Crisis Center. When in crisis, most people aren't likely to flip through the yellow pages looking for a number to an organization that might or might not exist. If people in crisis knew about the center, they would be more likely to let their fingers do the walking and find its number.

McClaskey said a lack of people using the service wasn't the only problem, however. She also said the center's three paid employees had resigned, and there were fewer volunteers.

One reason for fewer volunteers might have been the hours. Volunteers manned the phones at the center all hours of the day and night. They might have been more willing to get calls on their home phones, and today's technology makes that possible. Evening volunteers could have had calls to the crisis center forwarded to their homes. The opportunity to work from home instead of working late nights at the center might make volunteering more palatable.

All isn't lost, though. There are other resources on campus for students in crisis like Lafene Health Center and Pawnee Mental Health Services. But both are problematic. For one, they aren't anonymous services. Lafene isn't a 24-hour service, and neither of the services are necessarily free.

For those reasons, K-State and Manhattan should mourn the loss of the FONE Crisis Center.

Tiny voices serve as reminder about how settlers brought holiday into existence

JEN KURCHE

"We've GOT to make noises in greater amounts! So open your mouth, lad! For every voice counts!" Thus he spoke as he climbed. When they got to the top, The lad cleared his throat and he shouted out, "YOPP!"
And that Yopp,
That one small yopp put it over!
Finally at last! From that speck on that clover
Their voices were heard! They rang out clear and clean.
And the elephant smiled. "Do you see what I mean?"
They proved they ARE persons, no matter how small.
And their whole world was saved by the smallest of all!"
— From "Horton Hears a Who," by Dr. Seuss

Thanksgiving was like that for me this year.

I thought a lot about small voices, particularly the voices of the colonists who invaded this country. What, after all, is Thanksgiving about? Thanks that the settlers managed to overwhelm the natives who lived here, relegate them to carved-out niches of self-governance on land that wasn't worth anything to anyone else?

I heard my own "Yopp" this Thanksgiving. It wasn't the first time. The first time came one day in high school when I was listening to a "Rage Against the Machine" album because I wanted to disturb the neighbors. I wanted to disturb them with "People of the Sun," the first track off the album, because it was loud, and it showed I was independent and because it had a message.

I wasn't sure what the message was. I knew it had something to do with Mexico, because Mexico is a country to the south, and because the south is sunny. I thought it probably had something to do with the fact that there are a few people in Mexico who are rich and a larger number who are poor, and I figured that made a pretty decent song. You could play it loud, anyway. I didn't care about details — I figured they should be left to the kids in Spanish class who studied things like Mexico.

I was in German class in high school. We studied banks.

Well, curiosity about subjects has a way of breaking into my interest the same way droplets of water can carve out a mammoth cavern before too long. I went to Mexico. I enjoyed the people I met. I found out that Mexicans lack a certain right to self-determination.

Yopp.

The last 70 years, the rule in Mexico has been determined by the PRI - one party, who, with the exception of a few benevolent cases, has warped the media into a cog of its own PR machine and has fixed elections from the local level to the national presidency. A widening gap between the rich and poor — due partly to the North American Free Trade Agreement — has heated the pot of revolutionary fervor almost to boiling. There are a number of Mexicans who believe the dictatorship of the PRI has made it nearly impossible to achieve social change through the traditional routes of democratic government. So, they cite article 39 of the Mexican constitution, which states the people have a right to modify their form of government.

A few of them have taken up arms. They call themselves "Zapatistas."

They are named for Emiliano Zapata, the leader of one of three main factions working to establish a new Mexico during the Revolution in 1910. Their goals and objectives mirror his demands that the Mexican government work to end illiteracy, provide people with the right to education, the right to dignified jobs, respect for indigenous peoples and cultures, the creation of hospitals, freedom for an independent press, cancellation of debts for the poor, the establishment of municipal self-government with relative autonomy, the development of birth clinics and child care and the creation of truly free elections. Their demands come from the founding documents they drew up at the outset of their fight against the government in 1994.

Since about that time, the Zapatistas have centered their activity in Chiapas — a land composed mostly of indigenous peoples. The government has met their calls for reform mostly with disdain and fierce reprisals, which they levy rather indiscriminately among the Chiapas natives in search of the Zapatistas among them.

The Zapatistas tried to make it abundantly clear that their objective is not Marxist, Maoist, Castroist or Communist in nature. It is democratic in objective and in operation. The entire movement governs itself by the same creed as it wishes Mexico were governed. When initial peace overtures were made by the federal government in June 1994, it was rejected by a vote of all Zapatistas. More mundane decisions regarding the daily operations of the movement are not made by one autocrat, rather they are made by a committee of elders from the communities of Zapatista-controlled territory.

If the Zapatistas are chauvinists, they are so only against their clear enemies. They see themselves as a national movement and an international movement representing a nationalism based merely on the belief that the underprivileged share a brotherhood of common struggle.

So I wasn't the only person thinking of the small voices on Thanksgiving. The spokesperson for the Zapatistas, Sub-Commander Marcos, was thinking of small voices, too — including those in our country.

Leonard Peltier is an ailing American Indian activist who celebrated this Thanksgiving in Leavenworth.

He ate his turkey inside the prison.

Peltier has been in federal custody since 1977. He was involved in a shootout at the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota — the same impoverished Pine Ridge president Clinton visited this year.

On June 26, 1975, a group consisting of federal marshals and FBI agents followed a boy into the reservation who had been accused of stealing a pair of boots. A skirmish erupted between a group of residents and the authorities. No one really knows who shot first, but in the resulting fire fight two federal agents and one American Indian were killed. In the aftermath, several marshals and agents went through the reservation burning homes and destroying property.

Peltier might or might not be directly guilty of the deaths. He is guilty of being one of the many men involved in the shootout and is guilty of being an activist for American Indians. For that reason, he has shouldered the responsibility for the crimes. That is the only fact the prosecution offers with any certainty. No other evidence of his involvement exists.

Supporters of Peltier have given November to him — a national "free Leonard Peltier" month. They are hoping the justice department will begin reexamining his case, the same way they have been reexamining Waco.

Marcos sent a letter to Peltier in October. In it, he commended him for his fortitude and conveyed his own admiration.

This September at Pine Ridge, two Lakota natives were found murdered and stuffed in a trash can. There still were no suspects in October.

Are we giving thanks for justice?

Yopp!

Brokaw's 'greatest generation' must adjust to modern world it created

DANEDRI THOMPSON

Tom Brokaw calls our grandparents' generation the greatest generation. I'm not so sure he's right. He says they are the generation that made the world what it is today by winning World War II and paving the way for our continued democracy.

That's all true.

They also did it all without complaint. When World War II erupted and the United States got involved, the men and women of that generation were steadfast in their commitment to the cause. A huge majority of the men served in the military — many without being drafted first. Those left behind happily gave up everyday luxuries to support the war effort.

That probably never would happen today. At the first hint of war, most in our generation would ignore the happenings, no matter how the outcome eventually might affect all of us. Our generation certainly wouldn't rush to enlist. In the Gulf War, one doctor, an enlisted-Reserve, even refused to go.

That's our generation, but I don't believe we are without hope. And I don't believe Brokaw's "greatest generation" is without fault.

My biggest problem with the generation my grandparents' age is its unwillingness to change old-world views in today's world.

For example, I know so many old, white men who still use racist language. Many are friends of my father, who happens to be black. I know they don't mean it. I know they don't mean to hurt anyone's feelings. I know they grew up hearing that kind of language everyday. Their friendship with my father — and they are call-in-the-middle-of-the-night-with-any-problem-kind-of friends — pretty much proves they aren't racists. But there is no excuse for using the N-word in the 1990s. It is unacceptable from anyone at anytime. Old age is not an excuse.

When a former roommate told her grandfather she was going to live with me, he asked her if he thought it was a good idea to mix the races. I know he thinks I am a nice woman. I know he probably didn't mean anything rude or offensive by it.

And I respect him. I respect that he has worked hard in his life to do right. I respect that he raised his children not to harbor those racist feelings, because if he had, my former roommate wouldn't be my friend in the first place. But it's hard for me to forgive those beliefs from anyone — even if they grew up learning and believing those things their entire lives.

Maybe that means I am not as forgiving as I should be, but it makes me angry that anyone would assume I am less worthy because of something over which I have no power. It isn't fair in this day and age, and it wasn't fair during their generation, either. And for a generation I respect, it's twice as unacceptable, because I expect more from a group so dedicated to American ideals.

Racist ideas aren't the only ones the greatest generation still is clutching in its grasp. They have crazy ideas about other things, too. I don't have to look further than my own family for proof of that.

I have an uncle who has five children. He doesn't beat or abuse his children, but he neglected them. As a group, they have no discipline, dirty faces, dirty clothes and a house with holes in the floor. Two of them, ages 10 and 15, haven't been to school in two years. When my nutjob of an aunt yanked them out of school, they were out of control and behind in school. Two of his other children are toddlers.

His oldest daughter, Gracie, is 20. She has a two-year-old baby, and she's getting her life together. She graduated from high school and is working her way through nursing school.

Fortunately for him, his wife left him and his kids. Social services showed up and threatened to take his children away, and now he's working like crazy to get things together. But he needs help.

His solution is to let his only adjusted child, Gracie, raise his two-year-old and his 15-year-old.

Wrong.

She's fighting an up-hill battle with her attempts to finish nursing school and raise her own child. The last thing she needs is to take her siblings into her home. She would be dragged down with them.

A wiser solution would be for my grandparents or someone else, like one of my aunts or my parents, who are in a better position to take the kids and help him.

But my grandparents are wrapped up in the beliefs of their generation.

Those beliefs say the eldest child is obligated to take care of the younger ones, even if it means dragging the only adjusted child down with them, even if it isn't necessary or wise. That's how it had to be done in their generation. The eldest child raised the younger ones if anything went wrong. It's a ridiculous notion in today's world though, especially when it's so unnecessary. My grandparents and most of my aunts and uncles no longer have children at home, and all of them have more money, means and experience to help my uncle than his oldest daughter has.

But heaven forbid our generation ask the greatest one to think about things differently in this modern world.

I respect the people of that generation and all they've done to make the world what it is today. But I can't call them the greatest generation until they are ready to adjust to the modern world they created.

Organization deserves praise for work on virtual career fair

Editor,

This letter is to recognize the dedication of Career and Employment Services.

I was going to express my concerns about why we need to better the Career Fair by having a separate internship career fair.

But once again, it is one step ahead of me.

I just was told about a virtual internship career fair in the works for early January.

Career and Employment Services has been very helpful to me, and I feel it deserves considerable recognition.

All of the hard work it puts into its programs keeps it competitive with the other universities around the nation.

Cartoon-cursor software tracks Web surfers

■ Computer-privacy experts upset by behind-the-scenes transmissions that track unknowing Web surfers.

BY TED BRIDIS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A company's popular software to change a Web browser's computer cursor into cartoon characters and other images is quietly tracking its customers across the Internet and recording which Web pages they visit.

Comet Systems Inc., a private company in New York, does not dispute that its free cursor software, installed by more than 16 million people, reports to its own computers with each customer's unique serial number each time that a person visits any of 60,000 Web sites — including dozens aimed at young children — that support its technology.

Computer privacy experts expressed dismay over the behind-the-scenes transmissions, which are sent without warning. But the company insists it is not violating customers' privacy because it does not attempt to match serial numbers against anyone's real-world identity. It published an explanation of its practices early Monday on its Internet site after questions over the weekend from The Associated Press.

"We don't know your gender, your age or anything except you're a Web browser visiting sites," Comet spokesman Ben Austin said. "There's not a lot of reason to crunch that data because I don't see that it's in anyone's economic interests. We're stating for the record that we don't do that and we never will."

Austin said the company tracks those serial numbers for a census of its customers, who aren't asked to disclose their names or e-mail addresses, and because some Web sites pay Comet based on the number of visitors using the cursor-changing technology.

Critics said the company should have more openly disclosed the transmissions to its customers. They also contend it would not be enormously difficult with today's technology to begin correlating the Comet serial number with a consumer's identity if the company suddenly decided to or if Comet — with its extensive tracking database — were purchased by new owners willing to do that.

"There's zero expectation that tracking is going on with this product," said Richard M. Smith of Brookline, Mass., a computer security expert who noticed the transmissions last week. "Who would have thought a little cursor could track your Web movements? It's going back to (Comet's) home base and saying this person with this serial number is now at this Web site."

Consumers are prompted to install Comet's cursor software, which takes only a few seconds, when they visit any of the 60,000 Web sites that support its technology, including those for the Dilbert and Peanuts characters of United Feature Syndicate Inc., the Ty Inc., Web site for Beanie Babies, the Garfield comic strip page and sites for children's movies like "The Iron Giant" from Warner Bros.

"What I find most disturbing is that most of these Web sites are for kids," Smith said. "You're asking a kid if it's OK to install this software. (Comet Systems) is in such a position to go back and find what sites did this user ID visit. There are so many ways to tie that to an offline identity."

Austin, the company spokesman, insists Comet has no such plans.

"When companies have gotten in trouble in the past, it's typically because they relate user IDs to some list of real names of actual people," Austin said. "We intentionally keep our users anonymous by not collecting names or e-mail addresses, and it's something we've stated we will not do."

The company's technology officer, Tom Schmitter, acknowledged Monday that part of the identifier harvested by Comet includes the serial number for each computer's network connection hardware. That means a customer's Web browsing history could be linked back to a specific machine by examining the company's tracking logs and his personal computer.

Schmitter said Comet was unaware until Monday it had been collecting those numbers and promised to delete those records, but the company will continue to randomly assign serial numbers to its customers because it needs to count them accurately to make money.

Privacy experts said it was unclear whether Comet was violating any law, although Jason Catlett of Junkbusters Corp., a New Jersey-based privacy advocate, wrote Monday to New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer asking him to investigate. Catlett called Comet's actions a wholesale violation of its users' privacy.

Stalker uses Net sources to track down, kill victim

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — Since junior high, Liam Youens had been obsessed with Amy Boyers. He kept Web pages where he wrote of perceived snubs and his desire to kill her, and used the Internet to find out all about her.

Last month, Youens, armed with a gun and the location of the dentist's office where Boyer worked, shot her to death, then killed himself.

The shootings took place Oct. 15 in Nashua, N.H., where Youens, 21, and his 20-year-old victim had gone to school together.

Youens' thoughts and plans are detailed in a police report drawn partly from the Web sites, where he debated with himself whether to kill Boyer, kill another former classmate, or storm into Nashua High School and kill as many people as he could, The Boston Globe reported Monday.

Youens paid hundreds of dollars to online research services to determine Boyer's birth date, Social Security number, address and the location of the dentist's office.

"It's actually obsene (sic) what you can find out about people on the Internet," he wrote.

Boyer's stepfather, Tim Remsburg, said he is considering a lawsuit against Geocities and Tripod, the two online companies where Youens maintained his Web sites.

Though both graduated from Nashua High in 1997, friends and family say Boyer wasn't aware of Youens or his obsession with her.

Youens' online journal chronicles the one-way relationship, recounting a humiliating day when she brushed past him in the school lunchroom, and a Valentine's Day when he realized she had received a rose from a boyfriend.

He also recalled realizing in the 10th grade that he was in love with her, and deciding shortly thereafter to kill her and himself, the Globe said.

"That was the basic plan for the next half decade," he wrote.

Wildcat football team signs ball to benefit Hale Library

BY SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A football signed by the K-State football team and Coach Bill Snyder will help raise funds for Hale Library.

Karen McCulloh, assistant dean to the library, said this was organized by the Friends of the Hale Library as part of the holiday bazaar going on right now.

The bazaar is a good opportunity to shop for presents, while helping out the library.

"We have our better books on sale that you can give someone for Christmas," she said. "It's a chance to do some early holiday shopping."

All books and other items were donated by the public, she said.

Tickets to win the signed football are being sold for $1 today and Wednesday on the second floor of the library.

McCulloh said the winner of the raffle will be announced Dec. 15.

Mary Griffith, Friends board member, said Snyder has helped the library greatly.

"Coach Bill Snyder serves on the board with us," she said. "He has been extremely generous."

Griffith said all money raised will benefit different areas of the library.

Activists launch battle in Seattle against World Trade Organization

BY LAURENCE M. CRUZ
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — Activists turned up the heat Monday on the World Trade Organization, taking their message to the streets and announcing plans for mass acts of civil disobedience when the ministerial conference begins today.

Authorities were forced to delay for 4 1/2 hours the start of Monday's activities after an apparent attempted break-in overnight at the downtown Washington State Convention and Trade Center, where the conference will take place.

Police spokeswoman Carmen Best said an officer inside the building spotted something suspicious in the early morning hours, prompting an evacuation. Best would not provide any details but said a subsequent security sweep found nothing dangerous.

WTO spokesman Hans-Peter Werner told reporters milling around outside the building that someone had tried to break in overnight, and the Secret Service was conducting another security sweep. Werner said he did not know whether that could delay a symposium in which environmental, labor and other organizations were to voice their concerns about world trade policy to organization officials.

About a mile north of the convention center, environmental protesters tried to hang a banner from a construction crane. The Rainforest Action Network claimed responsibility for the protest.

At least 500 protesters — some on stilts and wearing butterfly costumes, others wielding massive papier-mâché puppets — marched through the trendy Capitol Hill district Sunday under blue skies and record temperatures in the high 50s.

Later, they protested at two stores owned by The Gap clothing retailer, saying the stores sell clothes manufactured under sweatshop conditions overseas. The company has denied the allegations.

A spokesman for Direct Action Network, which sponsored the rally, said demonstrators on Tuesday intend to lie down in streets and lock themselves to fence posts or each other. Their goal: preventing delegates from entering the downtown convention center for the start of the talks.

Activists even took their message to the skies. A plane trailing a banner saying "People Over Profits: Stop WTO" circled the Space Needle, which was packed with tourists on two levels.

Women's team prepares for home action tonight

BY SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coming off two losses in the Cancun Tournament last week, including the 73-72 loss to then-No. 7 NC State, the women's basketball looks to get back on track tonight against the Eastern Michigan Eagles at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Wildcats (1-2) defeated the Eagles (1-2) last year in Manhattan 78-66. Head coach Deb Patterson said the team should win if it competes at the same level as it did against NC State.

"We played great basketball down there, as good as I've seen our program play," Patterson said. "I think this contest is extremely important because we need to establish consistency, and I think we need to get that win, because we played two great games but didn't come out with a victory.

"Now you're at the point where, yeah, you have to have wins, but more importantly it's about playing at that level every time you take the floor."

K-State has the height advantage in the post game, but Patterson said the Eagles boast quickness inside. Senior center Olga Firsova said it will be a matter of playing solid basketball.

"I want to come out and win, and I want to play hard," Firsova said. "We're going to work hard on the boards, we're going to try to get as many rebounds as we can, and just make hard moves and score, block shots and not foul."

Junior Kim Woodlee said the Eagles, led this season in scoring by guard Kris Kachaturoff, who's averaged 14 points per contest, pose a challenge to the Cats on the perimeter as they like to score off the drive.

"They play a lot of freelance and they like to penetrate a lot," Woodlee said. "They do a lot of flashing, a lot of cutting, so we've got to be sure to jump the ball and try to prevent middle penetration."

The Eagles play a zone defense, something the Cats have seen only a few minutes of this season. Patterson said this will test the team.

"They bring a new dimension in that they play a lot of zone. That's another challenge, can we stay aggressive, can we get in a rhythm, can we play well and rebound well against a team that I expect to play about 35 minutes of zone."

The Cats also will be concerned with their own defensive end of the court as the Eagles present a style of play that can put some teams out of sync, Patterson said.

"Immediately you have to be concerned with staying very fundamental because it's easy when you play a team like Eastern Michigan to become very

McLaughlin receives honor as top coach in conference

BY NABIL SHAHEEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

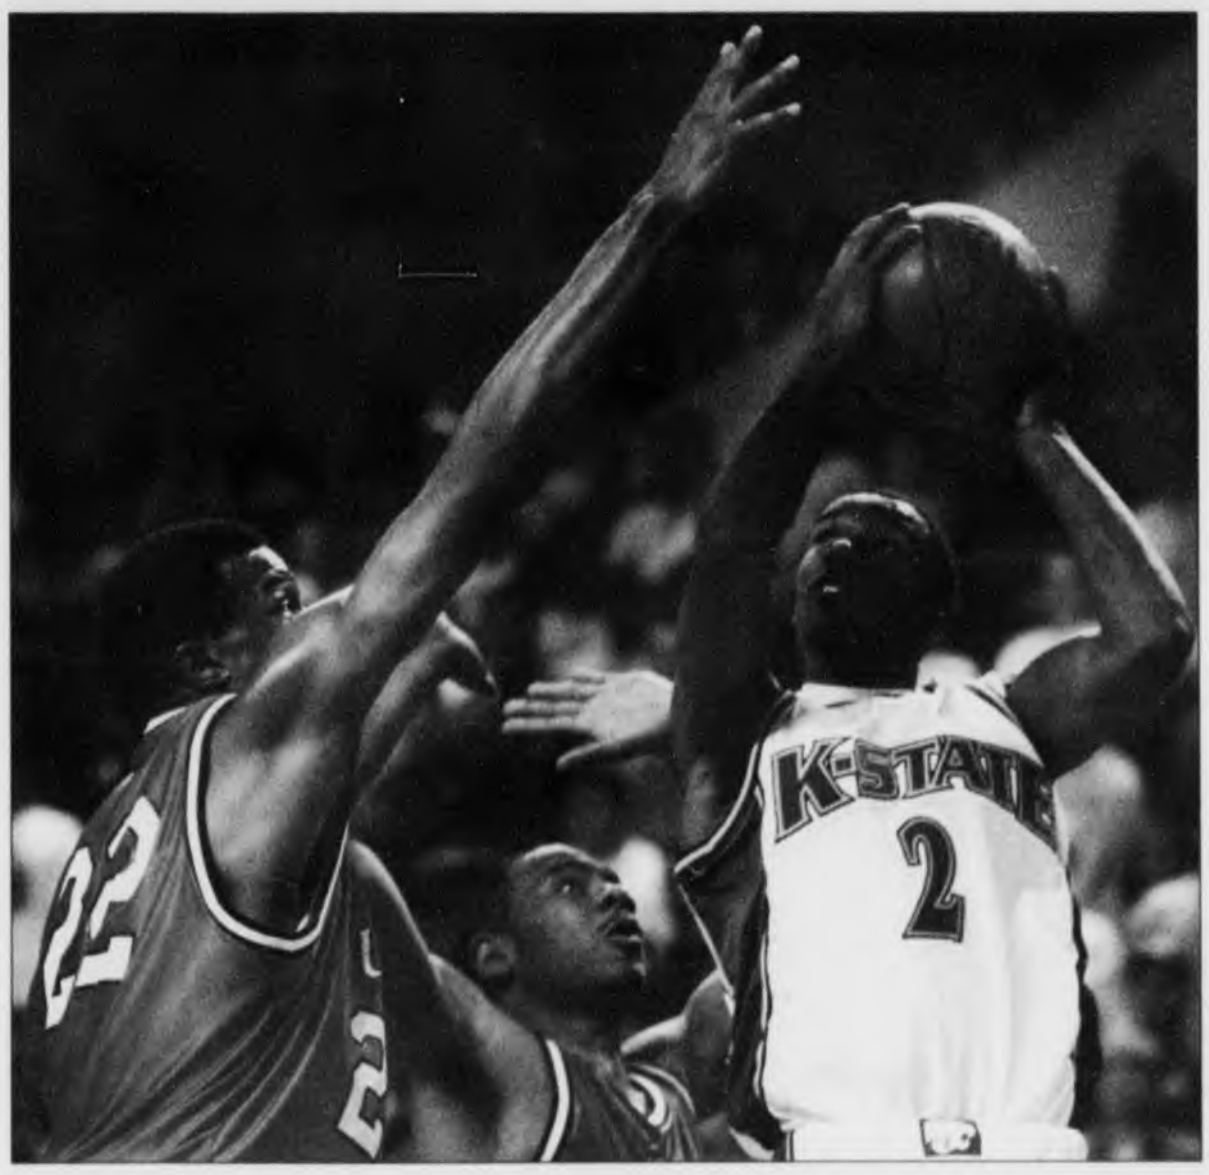
After leading the volleyball team to its first victories over Nebraska and Texas, Jim McLaughlin has been named the Big 12 Conference Coach of the Year by league coaches.

Senior Dawn Cady and Sophomore Disney Bronnenberg received First Team All-Big 12 honors. Sophomore Liz Wegner received honorable mention.

McLaughlin, in his third year at the helm of the volleyball program, said he was surprised by the recognition and acknowledged the work of his assistant coaches.

"I've heard Max Urick and Dr. Wefald, you always hear those guys talking about the people around them," McLaughlin said. "You've got to have great people around you, and I do. Suzie (Wiemers) and Jeff (Grove) do a lot. When something like this happens, it just reflects the program."

The women's tuneup of their game is what earned them the rewards, McLaughlin said.



"The most important thing is they've all improved at different rates," he said. "Dawn maybe has improved more than any player I've ever coached. Her mentality and her drive is unmatched. Dawn works harder than maybe any player I've ever coached, men, U.S.A. men or college championship team. She is a unique person."

McLaughlin said that even with the standout play of Cady, Bronnenberg, and Wegner, they still need their teammates, and vice versa — something K-State volleyball is based on.

"Dawn, Liz and Diz, they all need their teammates as much as their teammates need them," McLaughlin said. "But that's the neat thing about K-State, and that's been our philosophy — unity, you've got to be united."

The women's trek to the NCAA Championship in Honolulu, Hawaii, begins Thursday in Fort Collins, Colo., as they face the Cardinals of Louisville in the NCAA first rounds.

Should they win, the Cats would face the winner of the Colorado State/Loyola of Chicago contest.

Cortez Groves goes up for a shot over Texas-San Antonio's Leon Watson and Mahcoe Parker in the first half of Monday's game at Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats won the game 86-75.

Cats overcome turnovers to capture victory

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Turnovers continued to plague the K-State Wildcats in Tuesday night's 86-75 victory over the Texas-San Antonio Roadrunners at Bramlage Coliseum. For the second game in a row, K-State turned the ball over 25 times or more.

Despite winning by just 11, the Cats (2-1) did have the Roadrunners (3-1) just where they wanted them midway through the second half. Leading by 23, K-State managed to let the Roadrunners creep back into the contest. Texas-San Antonio trailing only by 9 with a minute left after three-pointer by Jon Havens.

"We're just trying to get the feel of the game with a group of five guys," senior guard Cortez Groves said. "We have to get a feel what each of us can do where we can do it at."

Head coach Tom Asbury opted for a different lineup against the Roadrunners, namely at the point guard position, where the Cats have struggled this season. Junior Galen Morrison assumed the role early in the season, but after a six-turnover performance against Northwestern State a week ago, it was freshman Kenyatta Dix who saw the court in a starting role against UTSA.

Asbury said he attributed the victory to a lack of preparedness by the Roadrunners and that K-State thought it was going to be an easy win for them.

"I just think it was one of those kind of games that we were expecting to blow them out," Asbury said. "They aren't good enough to do that yet. We're talented enough, but we're just not good enough to do that yet.

"I think it's a game that the guys think in the back of their mind that, 'We're going to win this game.' We don't have that kind of intellect. These guys aren't smart enough and experienced enough to be able to make that determination."

Three-fourths of the game was all K-State. Despite 15 first-half turnovers, K-State managed to take a solid 12 point lead into halftime.

The controlling lead for K-State in the first half can be attributed to some old-fashioned defense as they held the Roadrunners to 17-percent shooting from the field. In fact, the Roadrunners had just six field goals in the opening half, but their free-throw shooting was what kept them in the game, making 10 of 14 from the charity stripe.

Point guard comes back early from knee injury

BY ERICA COURTRIGHT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The expectation that sophomore point guard Josh Kimm would be out for a season was cut to just three games Monday night.

Kimm made his first appearance of the season for the Wildcats against Texas-San Antonio after early predictions that a knee injury would keep him sidelined for the season.

Kimm tore his ACL and partially tore the meniscus of his left knee on July 12 in a pickup game in Iowa and underwent surgery on July 27.

The injury happened during something Kimm said he had done a million times before.

"I was just playing basketball, went to go cut, and my leg buckled up," Kimm said.

Initially, Kimm was expected to miss the entire 1999-2000 season with the possibility of

In matchup between Cotton, Holiday bowls, San Diego appears to be better choice

It's funny how sometimes a margin as small as 5 feet can make so much difference.

When Colorado placekicker Jeremy Aldrich's 34-yard boot slipped just outside the right upright as regulation time expired during Friday's nailbiter against Nebraska, K-State's Big 12 title hopes sailed away with it. A successful kick would have sealed a Nebraska loss, putting the Wildcats back into the Big 12 Championship game against Texas and in line for a place in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl.

Instead, a space about like the one between you and the guy sleeping two rows ahead of you (assuming you're reading the paper in class) was what kept K-State from the Big 12 title game and control of its bowl destiny. Aldrich's miss gave the Cornhuskers a chance to win 33-30 in overtime and clinch the title game berth.

The easy response for K-State fans would be to blame Aldrich who did, after all, miss a kick that Jamie Rheem could make blindfolded. But that would shortchange the Buffaloes' effort, coming from way behind to nearly knock off a clearly superior team. Besides, if the Cats had taken care of business against the Huskers, they never would have needed Aldrich or the Buffs' help to bolster their postseason hopes.

Blame aside, Friday's game did clear up K-State's bowl scenarios somewhat. The bad news, though, is that the Wildcats' BCS bowl hopes look to be little more than smoking rubble at this point. Nebraska's narrow win, coupled with Virginia Tech's blowout of Boston College, basically eliminates the Huskers' chances of hopping over Tech and into the Nokia Sugar Bowl, a scenario which would have landed K-State in the Fiesta Bowl.

Further, the FedEx Orange Bowl, which had been mentioned prominently as another possible suitor, appears to be barely even a remote possibility. The Orange's official Web site projects a matchup of Michigan and the SEC championship game winner, which seems a pretty sure sign that K-State is on the outside looking in.

So, with another BCS shutout most likely looming for a one-loss Wildcat team, K-State's bowling plans appear to basically look like this: if Nebraska wins the Big 12 title game, K-State will go to the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl, in Dallas. If Texas wins, K-State heads to the Culligan Holiday Bowl in San Diego.

So, who should you root for when the Longhorns and Huskers meet to decide the Wildcats' fate? For your consideration, here's a comparison of some integral facts about each of the two likely destinations.

■ Opponent

Cotton Bowl (Dallas): Mississippi State (9-2), Arkansas, or Georgia (both 7-4)

Holiday Bowl (San Diego): Washington (7-4)

Advantage: Cotton Bowl. All of these matchups are winnable, and more competitive than Washington, which wouldn't have seven wins if not for playing in the Pac-10. The chance to jeer Rick Neuheisel is still tempting..

■ K-State's history in the bowl

CB: 0-1 with a 19-15 loss to Brigham Young in 1997.

HB: 1-0 with a 54-21 win over Colorado State in 1995.

Advantage: Holiday Bowl.

■ Snubbed K-State last season?

CB: Yes.

HB: Yes.

Advantage: Even.

■ History of the game's site.

CB: (The Cotton Bowl) Home of Doak Walker.

HB: (Qualcomm Stadium) Home of Ryan Leaf.

Advantage: Cotton Bowl— big time.

■ Area attractions

CB: Texas Book Depository Museum, Billy Bob's Texas ("The World's Largest Honkey Tonk").

HB: Sea World, San Diego Zoo.

Advantage: Holiday Bowl.

■ Area scenery

CB: Urban sprawl, with gridlock.

HB: Urban sprawl, with beaches.

Advantage: Holiday Bowl.

■ Length of drive (from Manhattan)

CB: Long.

HB: Really, really long.

Advantage: Cotton Bowl.

■ Distance from there to Tijuana

CB: 25 hours.

HB: 25 minutes.

Advantage: Holiday Bowl.

■ Economy Lodging

CB: Best Western ($50/night) "...dependable, affordable accommodations."

HB: Banana Bungalow ($18/night) "...scruffy rooms close to the beach, keg nights, barbecues and party-all-night-crowd."

Advantage: Holiday Bowl.

■ Chances the game will be disrupted by Y2K-related computer problems and/or Armageddon

CB: Played on Jan. 1, 2000. There could be hysteria and mass destruction.

HB: Played on Dec. 29, 1999. The only hysteria and mass destruction would be for Washington's offense.

Advantage: Holiday Bowl.

There you have it — when you lay them out side-by-side, it appears that the less-heralded Holiday Bowl might actually be K-State's destination of choice. Yes, the BCS might have passed K-State over again, but no worries — I hear San Diego is nice in December. Well, better than San Antonio, at least.

Bowl picture beginning to come into focus

Book it: No. 1 Florida State vs. No. 2 Virginia Tech in the Sugar Bowl on Jan. 4.

In what will become a perfect ending to a perfect regular season, Virginia Tech is certain to hold off Nebraska in the final Bowl Championship Series standings, setting up a No. 1 vs. No. 2 game for the national title in New Orleans.

The Hokies (11-0) increased their second-place lead over the Huskers from .63 points to 1.54 points in the latest BCS standings released Monday. The final BCS standings, which determines the teams that will play in its title game, will be released Dec. 5.

The advantage, according to one computer expert, is all but impossible to overcome — even if Nebraska routs Texas in Saturday's Big 12 Conference title game in San Antonio.

"There's no suspense," Chicago-based computer expert Jerry Palm said. "If Nebraska wins 50-0, I'm not sure that could overtake Virginia Tech."

From the start of the Hokies-Huskers points battle, Virginia Tech coach Frank Beamer has been confident the top teams would end up in the national title game. But until the final results are in, he's not taking anything for granted.

"There's too much invested in the BCS so that the two best teams will play," Beamer said. "I personally think one of the teams has to be Virginia Tech.

"With all the hard work by our coaches and all the hard work by our players, I would be devastated if we did not make it."

The BCS standings are based on a formula that considers The Associated Press poll and the USA Today/ESPN coaches' poll, eight computer rankings, strength of schedule and losses..

Campus organization lends assistance, advice on law to student body

By REGINA STANTON
Kansas State Collegian

Whether a student is fighting a parking ticket or looking for a campus organization, the Office of Student Activities and Services, located on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union, is available to help.

"Everyone, all years of students, comes in," Gayle Spencer, OSAS coordinator, said.

The office houses the Student Governing Association, Student Judicial System, University Activities Board, Student Legal Services, Consumer and Tenant Affairs and Student Organizations Budget Office.

"There is no charge for these services. Students have already paid for these services in their activities fee," Spencer said.

The only fee that students might have to pay is for use of Legal Services, depending on what they need help with.

"There is a $15 charge for being represented in court and for wills to be drawn up," Dianne Urban, attorney for legal services, said.

The OSAS is important to K-State students because it houses SGA, Spencer said.

The office also is where new organizations wishing to be a part of campus activities are required to register. A representative from the group needs to make an appointment and meet with someone from the office. During the meeting, the representative pays $5 to become registered with the office and acquire an adviser.

Spencer said it usually isn't difficult for an organization to become affiliated with OSAS.

"Most organizations are accepted," she said.

Those groups that would not be accepted are those that are not open to everyone on campus or those that have fewer than 10 people involved, Spencer said. Groups must have at least 10 people to meet guidelines.

"Students can set up an appointment with the lawyer to get legal advice," Spencer said.

Legal Services offers a variety of services, including counseling; drawing up documents and contracts, including wills; and representation in court, Urban said.

"Many students don't know about Legal Services," she said.

The biggest problem that Legal Services handles is landlord and tenant complaints, but it tries to help with a little bit of everything, Urban said.

Legal Services represents some students in court for landlord and tenant problems or criminal charges if the charges are insigificant.

Urban said she can give advice, write a letter on a person's behalf, talk about settlement or go to court for a student.

The OSAS is open Monday through Friday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

For more information on any of these services or for an appointment, students can call 532-6541, or walk in for an appointment.

Important questions should be considered when investing

The space constraints of this column never would allow a complete overview of selecting investments, especially of identifying the few excellent ones from the large body of good ones. Instead, I will highlight some of the important questions I ask when considering a company for investment with the expectation that your curiosity will lead you to ask the questions that provide the detailed information necessary to make excellent investment decisions. Experience might be a lousy teacher, because it gives the test before the lesson, but it also is the only way to understand fully what you're doing.

Always start by getting as much information as you can from the company. The best sources often are the company itself and information available from the Securities and Exchange Commission. Barring interviews with the company's management and business partners, this will be the information from which most of your conclusions are derived.

Take a look at the company's earnings. Have these earnings grown consistently over time (the past five- or 10-year period), or have they been erratic, jumping from losses to profits here and there? How much of the growth can be associated with unusual economic conditions (such as luxury-car sales in boom periods) vs. management experience and product quality (economic booms usually don't increase paper-towel sales)? If the company's earnings are interrupted during a period of time, what caused the interruption, was it a one-time event and is it likely to occur again?

Take a close look at the profit-and-loss statement. Are sales concentrated in old products, or in a mixture of new and old? What drives the majority of sales? What risks of increased costs are there (such as substantial labor-union participation)? Calculate the return on equity of the company by dividing annual profit by the balance sheet shareholder's equity figure. Most companies range from 11 percent to 14 percent. Is the company's return high or low?

Consider where the company's money is going by looking at the cash flow statement, which tracks a company's uses of cash. Is the company funding expansion with cash from operations, or is it borrowing to expand? Is the company repurchasing stock or paying down debt? If the company is expanding, does the growth in shareholder's equity matched by a similar percentage growth in annual profits? Some companies do not earn a substantial enough gain on invested capital to justify substantial expansion of the business vs. cash distributions to shareholders.

Take a close look at the balance sheet. What items make up the assets of the company, and what items make up the liabilities? Always compare similar industries because of their unique qualities: Airlines usually have large cash accounts and large-equipment asset accounts, vs. software companies, which often have very few equipment assets and a lot of cash. What percentage of the assets are represented by debt? Utilities generally have high debt-to-asset ratios, and software companies do not. Look out for intangible items, such as goodwill representing a company's reputation or market power. These intangibles cannot be converted into cash should the company need funds.

Consider the business of the company. Is it an industry that requires continual product development for future success? What investment is the company making in research and development of new products? Does the company have a dominant position in the industry, such as Coca-Cola or Intel? More importantly, do you understand the company's business well enough to understand the effects of various economic factors on the company beyond "earnings may fall in recessions?" Furthermore, how does the company compare with others in its industry: Is it a low-cost or high-cost producer? Determining this will require investigating several companies before investment, after which you might decide to invest in a company that competes with the company with which you originally were interested.

Consider the price of the shares of the company. Is this price reasonable for the expectations of the business? In other words, is there a margin of safety in the stock large enough to justify investment? Often this requires following this rule: Never follow the crowd.

Some of today's popular companies often are bottomless holes. Consider Amazon.com, currently at about $77 a share with a market value of $22.6 billion. Amazon has yet to make a profit and will lose about a half-billion dollars this year on its sales, a rate at which it will have more debt than assets by December 2000. A quick review of the company's history details the company's ability to lose ever more money when it tries to sell new items online. Will Amazon.com ever be profitable? Possibly, but it certainly does not offer a margin of safety to be considered a good investment regardless of past returns on the shares. Right now, the entire $22.6 billion value is based on yet-unrealized future expectations.

This is a short list of questions you will want to ask when considering a company for investment, and it is certainly not comprehensive. However, it will certainly serve as a good initial foundation for looking into a company and asking additional questions to pick apart the business as much as possible before committing funds to its shares.

Russians urge Chechen civilians to flee amid continued bombings

BY RUSLAN MUSAYEV
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GROZNY, Russia — Russian officials on Monday urged civilians hiding in basements beneath ruined homes in Grozny to flee the Chechen capital — a risky endeavor with Russian rockets screaming relentlessly into the city.

Federal forces showed no signs of easing up raids on the breakaway republic of Chechnya even as a top international mediator had talks in Moscow to arrange a visit to the republic.

The Kremlin has dismissed international criticism of its campaign in Chechnya as meddling in Russia's internal affairs. The Russians have intensified their bombardment of Grozny in the past week, leaving hundreds dead or wounded and destroying scores of buildings and homes. Russian officials estimate 50,000 civilians remain in the city, many of whom are old, infirm or lack transportation to leave.

In brief intervals between the strikes Monday, civilians crawled out of basement shelters to fetch water and try to find food.

"It's like an endless lottery, with death being the only stake. Every day brings new death," said Marzhan Khakimova, a 72-year-old woman living in a Grozny basement.

Monday's raids hit one of Grozny's main thoroughfares, Avtarkhanov Avenue, as well as residential neighborhoods and a car market. Witnesses said there were casualties, but no figures were immediately available.

In Moscow, Deputy Prime Minister Nikolai Koshman, Russia's representative to Chechnya, said Moscow would rebuild Grozny when the war was over, but now was the time for civilians to flee.

"There is nothing to do in Grozny now — it is necessary to close it down and take the entire peaceful population away," Koshman said.

Russian warplanes have been dropping leaflets on Grozny offering civilians a safe corridor out of the city, but it was not immediately clear how the residents would be able to safely flee the steady strikes.

Russian officials estimate 50,000 civilians remain in the city, many of whom are old, infirm or lack transportation to leave.

Fleeing Chechnya also was proving difficult. The border post with neighboring Ingushetia was closed during the first half of the day, and an estimated 3,000 civilians, many of them from Grozny, formed a line more than a half-mile long at the border.

The closure was due to electricity and computer problems that prevented authorities from properly registering the refugees. It was fixed and the border was opened in the afternoon, the military said.

Russia says it wants to destroy the militants before beginning negotiations.

The international community is pressing Russia to halt the offensive, complaining of widespread civilian casualties and the plight of the 233,000 refugees who have fled the fighting.

Catholic, Protestant enemies join to assemble inclusive Northern Ireland government

BY SHAWN POGATCHNIK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — On a day many thought would never come, Protestant and Catholic adversaries on Monday formed an extraordinary Northern Ireland government that attempts to bring together every branch of opinion within this bitterly divided society.

The unprecedented four-party administration — due to receive powers Thursday from the British government — includes Catholics who long vowed never to accept Northern Ireland's right to exist, and Protestants just as unwilling to accept Catholics as political equals.

Triggering an exercise envisioned in the Good Friday peace accord but delayed for more than a year, the four biggest parties within Northern Ireland's legislature took turns unveiling their choices for a 12-member Cabinet, an exercise akin to a pro sports draft pick.

Picking first were the province's main British Protestant party, the Ulster Unionists, and primary Irish Catholic party, the Social Democratic and Labor Party or SDLP. They both got four posts.

But Protestant legislators gathered at Stormont Parliamentary Building in Belfast gasped when Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams named his first pick — his party's chief negotiator, Martin McGuinness, as education minister.

"We now have a mastermind of murder in a position to educate our children."

— Nigel Dodds, new minister for social development

McGuinness — who rose to the top of the Irish Republican Army's command in the 1970s — will oversee the predominantly Protestant state schools as well as the separate Catholic system.

Sinn Fein's other candidate, schoolteacher Bairbre de Brun, had been considered the far more likely pick for the education post. She instead received the health ministry, arguably the toughest job in the administration, since closing hospitals is on the agenda.

"The reality is that very many young people do look up to Martin McGuinness," said Sinn Fein chairman Mitchel McLaughlin, who pledged that both McGuinness and de Brun would help project a vision of a society at peace with itself.

Even the Democratic Unionists, the province's most uncompromising Protestant party, took their two allotted posts within a Cabinet they had hoped would never be born.

The Democratic Unionists promised to do their jobs impartially but vowed never to sit in the same Cabinet room as McGuinness, a factor certain to make the government's early days problematic.

"We will never rest until we rid this country of IRA-Sinn Fein and all other brands of terrorism. They have no place in any democracy," said the Rev. Ian Paisley, the Democratic Unionist leader.

Paisley's deputy party leader, Peter Robinson, became minister for regional development, and a longtime aide, Nigel Dodds, will be minister for social development.

"We now have a mastermind of murder in a position to educate our children," said Dodds, whom the IRA tried to kill three years ago while he was visiting his gravely ill boy in a hospital.

The Ulster Unionists, who made Monday's Cabinet formation possible by dropping their longtime demand for IRA disarmament in advance, took a far more upbeat view.

Ulster Unionist negotiator Reg Empey, who became the Cabinet's minister for enterprise, trade and investment, blamed the Democratic Unionists for letting McGuinness take the education portfolio. He noted Paisley had the third pick, Adams the fourth.

"The fact is we're all in government with Sinn Fein now," Empey said. "We have to make the best of it, to show people in our long-suffering communities that politics can work, and to hope the IRA delivers their side of the bargain by decommissioning their weapons soon."

The British government in London, which abolished the province's longtime Ulster Unionist-dominated government in 1972 at the height of bloodshed, will retain control of policing, taxation and other important policy areas under the new arrangements.

Northern Ireland's only previous attempt at a joint Protestant-Catholic government, a joint Ulster Unionist-SDLP administration, collapsed after just five months in 1974 under the weight of a Protestant general strike. At that time, both Empey and David Trimble, who now maintains the Cabinet's top post of first minister, were party rebels who helped to topple the Ulster Unionists' compromise-minded leaders of the day.

The SDLP's then-leader, Gerry Fitt, noted the irony of Monday's unlikely events at Stormont.

"It's of course wonderful to see this dream finally taking shape. You do have to pinch yourself," said Fitt, who fled Belfast in the early 1980s after the IRA attacked his home.

RESIGNATION

said. "I've made a life-time commitment to be a part of the community."

Despite Greer's resignation, the commissioners are not worried about the transition, Commissioner Bruce Snead said. Fehr has been the acting city manager before and has plenty of experience. The transition is expected to go smoothly, he said.

Fehr has been assistant city manager since 1992 and was previously the acting city manager for seven months in 1995 when the commissioners voted 3-2 not to renew the city manager's contract. Fehr had been the assistant city manager for 2 1/2 years at the time he took the position.

"He knows all the issues," Commissioner Carol Peak said. "He's very bright and competent. He's been in this situation before."

Fehr's term begins Dec. 24, but the length of term is indefinite. He said he expects to remain as the acting city manager for about three to six months until a full-time city manager has been selected.

The day-to-day operations of the city will remain the same, Fehr said. They constantly deal with the development and growth issues of Manhattan.

"I've worked under four other managers and have learned a lot," Fehr said. "I'm looking forward to keeping the city functioning smoothly."

After the interim office has concluded, he said he expects to be a candidate for the full-time position.

"I feel comfortable with the responsibility," Fehr said. "I've gotten the experience and am ready to take on that role."

KIMM

being medically redshirted, but with 12:33 remaining in the first half, Kimm checked in for the Cats.

Head coach Tom Asbury said Kimm's early return might have surprised him in September, but not now.

"Seeing the way he rehabilitates and knowing how tough he is, I knew this. If anyone could come back in near-record time or record time, it would be Josh Kimm," Asbury said.

"I knew he'd be well ahead of schedule. He's probably a month, six weeks or maybe more ahead of schedule."

Kimm's playing time was limited to six minutes at the instruction of his doctor, Asbury said. During those minutes, Kimm did not attempt a field goal.

Asbury said Kimm is cleared for the remainder of the season to play as much as the coaching staff wants.

"If he plays like he did tonight, he won't get to play a whole lot more anyway," Asbury said.

ROADRUNNERS

Despite leading the entire game against the Roadrunners, Asbury said Texas-San Antonio is a team that K-State should have finished off, and that there isn't much to proud of when looking back at this game.

"You'd like to think you can come out and finish that team off," Asbury said. "We certainly can't sprain our wrists patting ourselves on the back after this one.

"The effort was solid, but performance wasn't there. We have to get better, and get better fast."

The Cats were led by senior Cortez Groves, with 24 points. Despite making seven of 17 from the field, it was from beyond the arc Groves decided to set up , making four of seven three-pointers.

WOMEN

oriented toward guarding the man," she said.

"When you're playing a team like NC State, you're playing the program. When you play Eastern Michigan, it's easy to alter your mindset and play the ball or your man, and that takes you out of the strength of your team and your program. I think it's about staying focused on doing what we do and doing it well."

Woodlee, like Patterson, said that if the team presents its game and sets the pace of the game, it will come out with a victory.

"Whenever we start not doing the things we need to do, we're going to be tentative," she said. "As long as we're aggressive and we play hard, we're going to do well."

"We really need to protect home court, and we definitely need a win. I feel like we've found out that we are very capable of winning any game we play and we really do have momentum coming off Cancun."

Tipoff is set for 7 p.m.

NAMING

fun," Jon Selisker, junior in advertising, said. "If I actually got a chance to win, my legacy would stay at K-State for years to come."

The retail store is scheduled to open January 2000 and will be designed to provide students with convenient snacks, meals, supplies and gifts.

"One of the goals of the retail store is to be more in-tune with the products students need today," Snyder said. "We also wanted to offer students the opportunity for convenience during nightly hours.

"Many students are on campus at night, and the retail store will be open while the rest of the Union is not," she said.

Snyder said the retail store is an extension of the old information counter and will be located on the first floor near the north entrance of the Union. Students will have access through two entrances — from the inside of the north entrance and along the south wall of the store.

"Naming the retail store will be a good decision for the students to make," Selisker said. "The decision is important, and the recognition they will receive is a great opportunity."

This retail store will offer many different product lines, including snacks, fountain drinks, hot dogs and nachos, clothing, school supplies, newspapers and magazines. It also will offer K-State mugs, novelties and film for purchasing and developing. The hours for the new shop will be 7 a.m. to 10 p.m. from Monday through Friday, 7 a.m. to 11 p.m. Saturday and noon to 10 p.m. Sunday.

"We want to accommodate for students' last-minute needs at night, and it will also be real handy during the day," Snyder said. "It is really neat for a student to have the opportunity to name a place on campus.

"One of the last times a naming contest took place was in the 1980s, and the Union Station was the result of that contest," she said.

Attention upstanding citizens!!!
Be warned that a new form of radio -- digital crack is more like it -- is about to be unleashed upon an unsuspecting nation. Called Live365.com, it is nothing less than a plot to lure an entire generation of young hearts and minds into an incredibly hypnotic world of sonic addiction.
Once they've got us hooked, the powers-that-be will start pumping the happy juice into the water supply and using our fillings to manipulate our brain waves.

As this confidential document clearly shows, Live365.com's Internet radio scheme just may be the brainchild of the Freemasons (the government behind the government).

Live365.com is many times more powerful than regular radio!!!!!!!!
Regular radio plays the same music over and over and has big blocks of commercials to break everything up. There's no way you can listen to it for any extended period.
Live365.com, on the other hand, has a ungodly amount of stations with something for everyone. Any time, day or night. Plus, they even let you broadcast your own radio. With no license and no rules.
Probability of moral decay??? 100%!!!

FACT 2
Live365.com is FREE to broadcasters and listeners alike. Hmm, can you think of any other place where everything is free? Say, Russia for example!!!!

FACT 3
Live365.com begins with the word live and live spelled backwards is evil!!!
LIVE EVIL
That's right, pure evil 365 days a year. And don't even get us started on the "com" part. Can you say Audio Abomination!?!

Hyde to present Landon Lecture today

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

HYDE

Rep. Henry Hyde is concerned with the nation's progress in the next century.

"We've made progress in science and technology," he said. "I'm going to express concern that we haven't made much progress in the field of national morality."

Hyde, R-Ill., will present the second Landon Lecture of the semester at 10:30 a.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

Hyde has served as chairman of the House Judiciary Committee since 1994. He played a key role in the impeachment hearings of President Clinton in 1998 and 1999.

Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series and assistant to the president, said Hyde's prominence in politics is why he was asked to give the lecture.

"He's been in Congress for a long time and has a great perspective on the problems facing the country," he said. "He also has some perspective on the upcoming election."

Hyde said his speech will address the intersection of culture and politics in modern society.

"I will stress the relationship between what we believe, what we nurture, what we act on," he said.

Hyde said he will discuss the problems facing the world at the turn of the century. He said he is aware of the positive and negative advances that science will have on humanity.

"When we unlocked the secrets of the atom, we were handed the keys to our own destruction," he said.

The Henry Hyde Landon Lecture is 10:30 a.m. Wednesday in McCain Auditorium.

The scientific discovery parallels the current experimentation with the human gene, he said.

"Now we're unlocking the secret of the gene, and that has a down side as well as a bright side," he said.

"Perhaps we can solve riddles like Alzheimer's and certain cancers," he said. "Maybe we will develop the power to manipulate humanity in a way that will have

Committee seeks funds for shelter

■ Approved enhancement proposal neglects 3 animal shelter requests.

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

A fund-raising committee is seeking an additional $100,000 for the enhancement of the T. Russell Reitz Regional Animal Shelter in Manhattan.

Diane Stoddard, assistant to the city manager, said three specific needs of the shelter were not met when the enhancement proposal was approved last year. She said an isolation ward for sick animals, a night-drop area and a visiting room for potential adoptions are crucial to the project.

To raise funding required to meet these requests, a fund-raising committee has been established. Stoddard said the group has raised about $16,000 and is hoping to acquire $100,000 by the end of January.

The city of Manhattan and Riley County Humane Society contributed $800,000 to an existing plan that will add 4,495 square feet to the shelter, renovate existing space and provide holding facilities for vicious animals. Separate cat, dog and puppy centers, runs and cages and improvements in ventilation and noise conditions also will be addressed.

Searchers find more than 100 dead in Mexico

By NIKO PRICE
The Associated Press

CIUDAD JUAREZ, Mexico — FBI forensic experts joined Mexican soldiers and ski-masked police Tuesday in searching two desert ranches near the border for the bodies of more than 100 Mexican and U.S. citizens, apparent victims of a drug gang.

A convoy of 16 vehicles, many with U.S. license plates, rumbled through the white iron gates of Rancho de la Campana, 10 miles southwest of Ciudad Juarez, at midmorning — joining scores of Mexican soldiers and police already working around the baby blue buildings in the hilly scrub desert. Some vehicles had newspaper taped over the windows to conceal what, or who, was inside.

Attention seemed concentrated on a concrete barn-like structure where workers were using a backhoe.

Violence in Seattle halts WTO events

■ Opening session nixed as troops called to action; curfew imposed.

By MARTIN CRUTSINGER

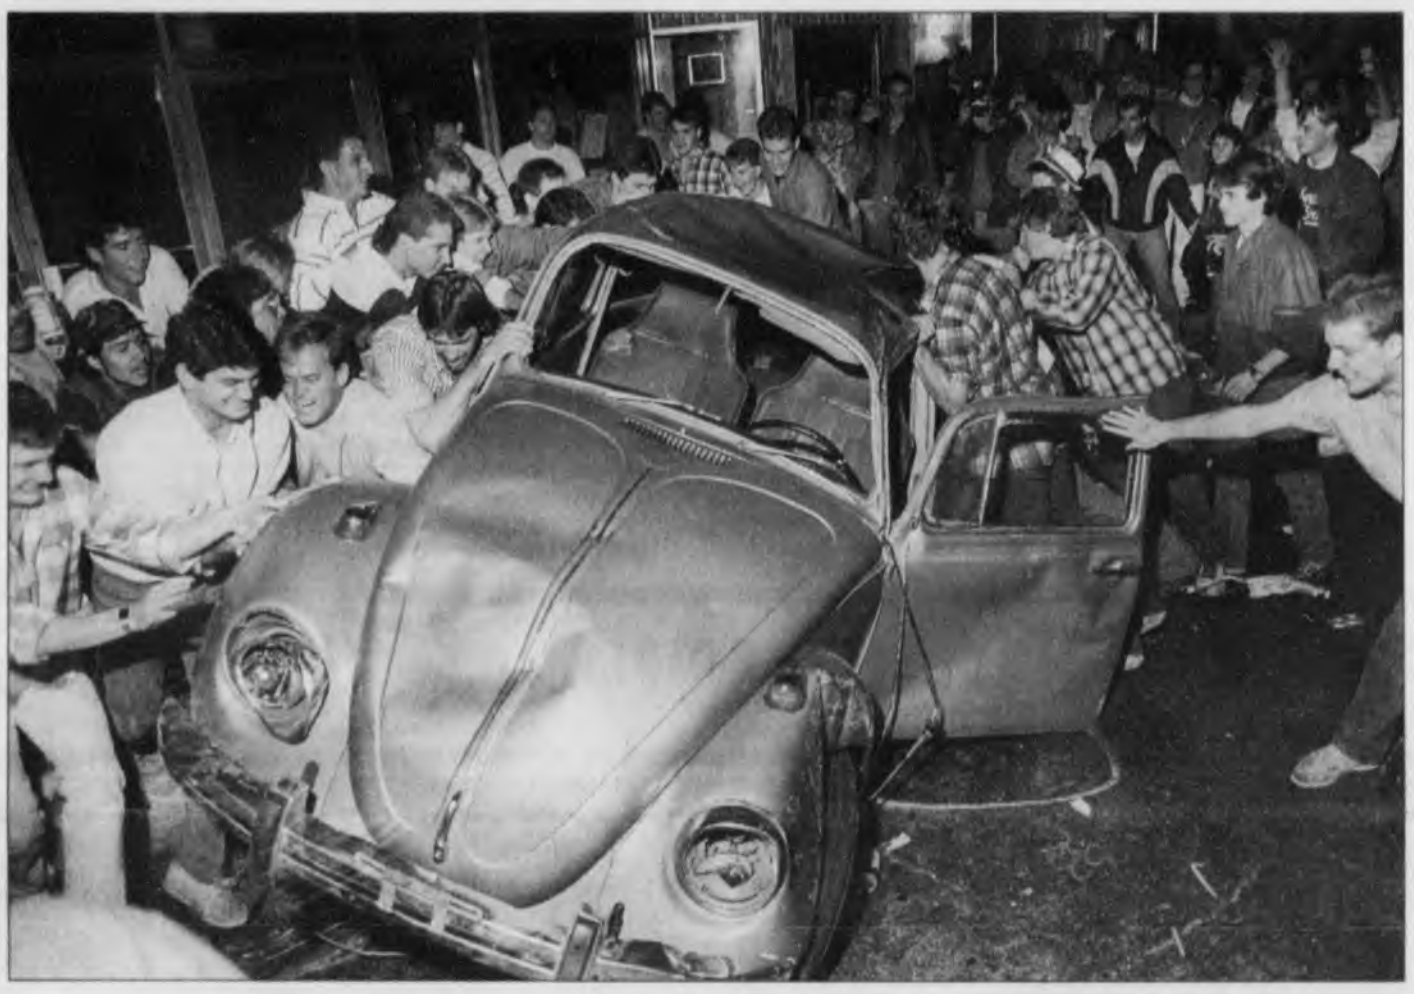
SEATTLE — Clashing repeatedly with police, protesters shut down the opening session of a global trade conference on Tuesday, forcing authorities to declare a state of emergency and handing President Clinton a setback in his efforts to convince skeptical Americans of the benefits of free trade.



Parts of this normally laid-back Pacific Northwest city were turned into a battle zone as police fired tear gas and pepper gas into clumps of protesters who at times turned violent, wrecking police cars and city buses and smashing downtown storefronts.

The protesters blocked intersections around the site of 135-nation World Trade Organization, preventing motorcades for U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright from making it to the opening session.

Students damage a Volkswagen parked on Moro Street, while nearly $70,000 in losses are recorded in Aggieville on Oct. 18, 1986. Nearly 5,000 people flooded the area after K-State defeated the University of Kansas 29-12 at a home football game.

Postgame festivities lead to arrests of rowdy football fans

The Collegian's Oct. 20, 1986, issue reported that arrests occurred after the severe damage done to Aggieville following a football game.

A celebration that got out of control.

That's how most recall the 1984 and 1986 Aggieville riots, both occurring after football victories over the University of Kansas.

But Riley County Police Director Alvan Johnson said these two riots were two of the darkest days in his time as director.

1984

Students tore down the goalposts after the 24-7 victory against KU on Oct. 13, 1984. It was one of three football victories that year.

Tim Fitzgerald, editor and publisher of Powercat Illustrated, said beating anyone in football then was monumental because the teams were so bad.

"Every year, the KU game was like the Super Bowl, because they were just that bad," he said. "At least we could say we weren't the worst in the state."

The goalposts later traveled to Aggieville, where the game celebration continued. At 11 p.m., 6,000 to 8,000 people flooded Aggieville to participate in the post-game festivities, the Kansas State Collegian reported Oct. 15, 1984.

But the festivities turned ugly.

There were 23 arrests, including 15 K-State students and two KU students. Charges included aggravated battery of an officer, disorderly conduct and damage to property.

Twenty-six people were treated and released from St. Mary Hospital and Lafene Health Center. Seven officers received injuries, the Collegian reported, and one officer, Robert Saber, was stabbed in the arm around midnight.

No reports of serious property damage to any businesses were made.

Johnson said he considered this riot to be the worst of the two, mainly because there were more cases of personal injury than in 1986, which had more incidents of property damage.

The scene

Everyone was happy, and everyone was drinking, Johnson said.

The noise was so loud that night that officers had difficulty hearing the radios attached to their belts, he said.

About 40 officers were working in the 11th and 12th blocks of Moro Street that night, but with 6,000 to 8,000 people there, many carrying six or 12 packs of beers or bottles, they didn't have the capacity to control the situation.

"As the night progressed, the situation worsened," he said.

Johnson remembers the incident that started the chaos that night. He and his assistant were near Hardee's when Saber was stabbed in the arm by a minor, bursting an artery.

"There hadn't been any difficulty that I know of until that point," he said.

Student's transfer request denied despite racial slur

NICKERSON, Kan. — School officials in Hutchinson have refused a transfer request from a black student who wants to leave the Nickerson High School after a racial slur and threats were found in the school's restroom.

Jeffrey Hubbard, a 14-year-old freshman, wants to transfer from Nickerson to nearby Hutchinson. But Hutchinson officials have refused to let him in, citing a district policy limiting transfers to the start of the year or the start of a trimester.

The second trimester at Hutchinson began Nov. 16. The racial slur and threats were discovered in the bathroom at Nickerson on Nov. 19.

"We've turned down other people, and I guess we need to stick with that," Hutchinson Principle Ronn Roehm said.

Hubbard is one of two black students at Nickerson. The other, 15-year-old Ashley Washington, plans to stay.

Hubbard lives in Hutchinson, but his house is five houses west of the dividing line between Hutchinson USD 308 and Nickerson-South Hutchinson USD 309.

The next trimester at Hutchinson begins in February.

"I feel helpless being a parent, not being able to do nothing but maybe eventually sending him back to the very place that I don't want him to be at," Jane Hubbard said Monday, a week after she began her efforts to transfer her son out of Nickerson High.

Jeffery Hubbard hasn't been at school since the graffiti discovery and the Thanksgiving break.

JonBenet Ramsey's parents sue Star on behalf of son

ATLANTA — John and Patsy Ramsey filed a $25 million lawsuit against the Star on Tuesday, alleging the supermarket tabloid libeled their son with stories calling him the prime suspect in the killing of his sister, JonBenet.

The federal lawsuit said the stories, published May 25 and June 1 which were later retracted, were false and defamatory, and subjected 12-year-old Burke to public hatred, contempt and ridicule.

One story ran with a front-page photo of the two children under the headline "JonBenet was killed by brother Burke."

The Star said it would fight the suit vigorously and said it would give the tabloid a chance to "conduct a complete investigation of the murder, pursuing avenues of inquiry that were not available to state investigators."

"We hope that the Ramsey family joins us now in the search for the killer of their daughter," a statement from the tabloid said.

JonBenet, 6, was found beaten and strangled Dec. 26, 1996, in the basement of the family's home in Boulder, Colo.

The Star's May 25 article alleged that Burke, who was 9 when his sister died, was the prime suspect in her slaying, and that the family was negotiating a plea bargain for the boy.

Study finds little knowledge about drunken driving laws

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Despite decades of efforts by alcohol education groups, a survey released Tuesday indicates that most Americans are unfamiliar with their states' laws against drunken driving.

The study, conducted by the Century Council, surveyed 1,004 adults over the age of 18 in 48 states and the District of Columbia.

"Seventy-eight percent of the drivers who were polled did not know what constituted drunk driving," said John Lawn, chairman of the group funded by the nation's leading alcoholic beverage producers. The findings, based on telephone interviews conducted over a four-day period beginning Nov. 5, have a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Although alcohol-related traffic accidents have declined steadily for 16 years, they caused 15,936 deaths in 1998.

The typical respondent said the maximum blood alcohol limit was .20 percent. Actually, 17 states and the District of Columbia use .08 percent, and 33 states allow the higher limit of .10 percent. Laws in all 50 states and the district dictate that drivers under 21 years old have no alcohol in their blood.

Man in Arizona wraps wife in tape, hauls her to court

PHOENIX — A man wrapped his wife with duct tape and hauled her to court, possibly in an effort to make sure he didn't lose bail money he had posted, authorities said.

According to police, Robert Horton, 52, carried Belinda Horton into the Maricopa County courthouse Monday and said, "Here she is."

Belinda Horton, 44, faced a hearing on charges of aggravated assault. She had been free on $1,700 bail, which her husband apparently posted.

Belinda Horton's legs were taped together from knees to ankles, her arms were bound across the front of her body, and there was a swatch of tape over her mouth, authorities said.

Officers took pictures for possible evidence against her husband.

"She was obviously very angry," Deputy Fire Chief Bob Khan said. "She would wince every once in a while, but she didn't say one word to our guys."

Two police officers watch as the Aggieville crowd continues to grow following a home football game against the KU on Oct. 18, 1986. One K-State student and four KU students were among the 10 people arrested during the night. Two military gas canisters also were used to control the crowd.

Several officers moved Saber through the crowd quickly to a waiting highway patrol car, Johnson said, but this rapid movement caught the crowd's attention. Johnson said it is a well-known fact that when in a crowd that big, especially one quite excited, it is bad policy to move quickly because it draws attention.

"We turned around and looked and, hell, the whole world was coming toward us," he said.

He said the crowd started throwing things at the officers then, but there wasn't any physical contact—yet.

A similar incident happened at 12th and Moro streets when officers responded quickly to a call that an officer was down.

"The officers turned and ran across the city lot toward 12th and Moro, and when they did the crowd took off chasing them," Johnson said.

Wayne Carstenson, part-time Riley County Police officer, said he has enough experience in Aggieville to know not to run in a crowd. He said he has seen a lot of rioting situations like in 1984, but that night was different.

"The crowd was zeroing in on police officers, which made it very scary for us," he said.

At one point, Carstenson said he and about six to eight officers were surrounded by a large crowd that was lobbing beer cans and bottles at them.

"We all had riot batons and were batting cans down," he said.

One of the officers standing next to him took a bottle in the mouth, and Carstenson said he had to have about 20 stitches. Another officer had an entire six-pack thrown at him, he said.

Carstenson said he believes mob mentality had a lot to do with the situation that night.

"The thought is, 'I'm part of a crowd. I can do anything I want and not get caught,'" he said.

1986

A fan holding a sign that said "Riot II" during the football game against KU on Oct. 18, 1986, foreshadowed the 1986 riot.

"People did what was almost expected," said Jeff Taylor, former Collegian photographer, who watched the riot from the top of the Campus Theatre.

K-State beat KU, 29-12, which was one of two victories that year. After the game, a line of trucks, motorcycles and convertibles cruised Aggieville's Moro Street celebrating the victory, the Collegian reported Oct. 20, 1986. Another large crowd of 4,000 to 6,000 people flooded Aggieville.

But just as two years before, the night would turn ugly for Aggieville.

"The second riot in Aggieville demonstrated that because of the publicity that was generated by the first incident, literally thousands came to Manhattan not to go to the game, but to go to Aggieville and cause trouble," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

Ten arrests were made, including one K-State student and four KU students, the Collegian reported.

More than $70,000 in damage to Aggieville was estimated.

Johnson said although police officers were better prepared, they weren't prepared to handle a riot.

A task force, which was formed after the 1984 riot, had put together a media campaign that encouraged people to act responsibly after the game, Johnson said.

Johnson said the chaos began when people got on the roofs of the buildings on the south side of 12th Street. There was a huge crowd in that area — wall-to-wall people, he said.

The trouble started when the people started pouring beer down on the people in the street, he said.

"Everything was good until that time," Johnson said.

People in the street responded by throwing their beer bottles or cans up at the people on the roofs, but the bottles ended up breaking windows and signs instead.

"That was the turning point," he said.

In the incident report, written by Johnson, it says, "Each time glass was heard to break, the crowd cheered ... It was impossible to see who and from where the bottles came that were causing damage. Uniformed officers were unable to penetrate the crowd due to the numbers."

By the end of the night, two military gas canisters were set off in Aggieville.

The students

Looking back, Ken Heinz, 1984 student body president, said it was a strange time.

He said the situation went away quickly and was forgotten a month later.

"I think everyone else made a bigger deal out of it than the students," he said. "Other people outside blew it out of proportion."

Heinz said he was surprised when he got a call at about 5 the next morning about the riot. When he drove to Aggieville at 7:30 a.m., he said he didn't see any signs of it.

In 1984, the age to drink 3.2 beer was 18 in Kansas. Heinz said the bars were overcrowded, and people were spilling into the streets, creating a dangerous situation.

Taylor, who was working on the book "A Week at K-State," said he was assigned to the top of the Campus Theatre to watch for the goalposts. He said he watched the crowd in Aggieville build after the game.

"I could see it slowly start to fill up. Soon it was elbow to elbow," he said.

Taylor said he wouldn't necessarily call that night a riot. He said it was youths out of control with lots of pent-up energy.

"I hadn't seen Aggieville that out of control, but what I witnessed there I've seen four or five times since," he said.

Changes

Johnson said that since 1966, when he first came to Manhattan, Aggieville has been an area of concern.

"We have always been concerned about the number of bars and the amount of intoxicating beverage that is dispensed in such a small area," he said.

After the 1986 riot, Johnson said he visited Palm Springs, Calif., because it dealt with a similar situation like the one in Aggieville during Easter weekend. There were back-to-back home games with KU in 1986 and 1987, and Johnson knew they might be facing a similar situation in 1987.

In 1987, there were about 300 officers in Aggieville from the Kansas Highway Patrol, Topeka, Junction City and Salina. An ordinance also was passed that said anyone carrying a hard container into Aggieville would be arrested, Johnson said.

"I think if there is any reason that we haven't had any problems since then it's that — that and the officer presence," Johnson said.

1980-1989 Campus facts

Campus changes
- KSDB-FM 91.9's dream comes true — it goes stereo in 1980.
- Student/teacher evaluations are proposed.
- The Kansas Board of Regents approves a new construction program for a scaled-down Bramlage Coliseum.
- K-State receives $4 million through the efforts of Sen. Bob Dole for the Educational Communication Center in 1986.
- In 1987, K-State President Jon Wefald pushes for a core curriculum.
- Wefald predicts that the losing days are over for K-State athletics after K-State's photo day.
- K-State sets guidelines for non-sexist language.

K-State administrative changes
- In 1985, Jim Dickey resigns as head football coach.
- Duane Acker resigns as university president.
- Wefald becomes K-State's new president in 1986. His past positions include president at Southwest State University and chancellor at Minnesota State University. His goals as K-State president are to improve declining enrollment, poor public image and low faculty morale. While moving into the president's house, the Wefalds lose Tuffy, their white toy poodle. A few days later, Tuffy returns home.
- Wefald puts Pat Bosco in charge of admission's efforts and hires Bob Krause as vice president for institutional advancement to deal with external relations.
- Wefald hires Bill Snyder, offensive coordinator at Iowa University, as the new head football coach. A few days later, Marlan E. Ray of Clay Center, Kan., reportedly goes into Wefald's office, yelling at him and attacking him. He was upset about the hiring of Snyder.
- Sue Peterson is appointed university lobbyist.

Campus
- Fire burns Willard Hall in 1981, causing $10,000 worth of damage.
- In 1989, K-State has more than 20,000 students enrolled, which marks a new record enrollment.
- In an unprecedented move in 1986, K-State Faculty Senate unanimously approves a motion asking for equal representation of faculty, students and alumni on the President Search Committee. Kansas Board of Regents denies the request.

City
- In 1980, seven Aggieville businesses are destroyed in a fire.
- The Manhattan City Commission presents a check for $1 million to Charlson & Wilson for the purchase of 14 properties to begin mall construction in 1985.
- In 1985, the Collegian reports that Wal-Mart officials are considering a second store in Manhattan. Nothing ever comes of it.

Varney's Book Store
1980-1989

Varney's Book Store went through a major expansion in 1989 when the store purchased the lot to the south of the store. Originally an IGA grocery store and Duckwalls, then later the Dark Horse Tavern, the new space allowed Varney's to expand their gifts and apparel, along with art and engineering supplies.

A whole new store front was added featuring stone trim and large glass windows, establishing the progressive image Varney's carries today.

Volleyball coach lives up to word yet again

Head coach Jim McLaughlin promised to take K-State's volleyball team to new heights when he was selected as its head coach three years ago. Three seasons and three invitations to the NCAA Tournament later, it's obvious McLaughlin is a man of his word.

By the end of his second season at the team's helm, he had amassed 39 victories — the most of any K-State head coaches in their first two seasons. He reached another milestone that year when his team won its first-round game in the NCAA Tournament.

He hasn't slowed down this season. The volleyball team beat Nebraska and Texas for the first time in K-State volleyball history. And the team is still going strong. Tomorrow it plays the University of Louisville in the first round of the NCAA Tournament in Fort Collins, Colo.

Fortunately, K-State volleyball successes aren't going unnoticed. The conference recently named him Big 12 Coach of the Year. The group also named two K-State players, Dawn Cady and Disney Bronnenberg, to the Big 12 first team. Player Liz Wegner received honorable mention from the conference. Even the fans are being recognized. K-State ranks third in the nation in volleyball game attendance.

Congratulations to the K-State volleyball team and McLaughlin. Your hard work and dedication have been an inspiration. Good luck Thursday.

Art imitates Life

ADAM HAYES/ COLLEGIAN

Cartoon character says life's moments mimicked by past 'Simpsons' episodes

Hi, I'm Troy McClure. You may remember me from such newspaper columns as "Hints from Heloise Gets the Incriminating Blood Stain Out" and "Spay and Neuter Your Pet the Can-Opener Way."

Contrary to popular belief sparked by the whimsical movie "Forrest Gump," life is not a box of chocolates. Rather, it is a series of events and moments that can consistently be traced back to episodes of "The Simpsons." Come with me now as I compare the magical world of everyone's favorite family since 1989 to the common drudgery of real life. The coincidences might shock and educate you.

Let's start off with something from the good ol' state of Kansas. Remember that little scuffle about the whole evolution thing? Well, the good folks at Springfield Elementary, Bart's school, went the way of the Sunflower State this season in an episode called, "Guess Who's Coming to Criticize Dinner?"

Principal Skinner: I hope you all enjoy your ride to and tour of The Springfield Shopper Newspaper. Groundskeeper Willie and I will stay behind to remove all traces of asbestos and the word "evolution" from our school.

Willie: Next stop, Margaritaville. Oh, the wee ones are still here. Heh heh. Oh, Principal Skinner, you'll be the death of us all.

Is cable too expensive for you, but you still want to enjoy the drama-like pornography on Cinemax? Well, in season two, stealing cable wasn't beneath Homer, and it shouldn't be for you either! Let's listen in as Homer convinces Marge.

Marge: Homer, we've talked about cable before. You really think we can afford it?

Homer: Nothing a month? Yeah, I think we can swing that.

Marge: Homer, are you sure this is legal?

Homer: Read the pamphlet

Marge reads aloud from "So You've Decided to Steal Cable."

Myth: It's only fair to pay for quality first-run movies. Fact: Most movies shown on cable get two stars or less and are repeated ad nauseum. Hmm, I don't know.

Owning a gun of some kind is as vital to life in the United States as oxygen and topless bars. Perhaps the same has happened to you.

Homer: Now I believe you have some sort of firearm for me.

Gun salesman: Well, let's see. According to your background check, you've been in a mental institution.

Homer: Yeah.

Gun salesman: Frequent problems with alcohol.

Homer [chuckling]: Whoa-ho, yeah.

Gun salesman: You beat up president Bush.

Homer: Former president.

Gun salesman stamps Homer's background check.

Homer [alarmed]: Potentially dangerous?

Gun salesman: Relax. That just limits you to three handguns or less.

Oh, Homer. You could outdo Charlton Heston any day of the week.

I don't know about you, but I love to go to the occasional candy industry trade show. You can bet your sweet, sweet candy Homer loves them, too. But when he went to one back in season six, Homer's theft of a gummi Venus de Milo got him busted for sexual harassment.

Homer and sexual harassment? It happened! The sweet, sweet candy somehow got stuck to the babysitter's behind, and when Homer pulled it off, the woman thought he was... y'know... copping a feel. So, he got the opportunity to be interviewed about the misunderstanding on "The Rock Bottom Show."

Homer: Ehh, someone had to take the babysitter home. Then I noticed she was sitting on the gummi Venus, so I grabbed it off her. Oh, just thinking about that sweet, sweet candy... [moans lustfully] I just wish I had another one right now. But the most important thing is —

Jones: That was really great Mr. Simpson. We got everything we need.

Homer: OK. Say, can you introduce me to the Sasquatch? I like his style.

But when Homer watched the program at home, he saw something else...

Homer: Somebody had to take the babysitter home. Then I noticed she was sitting on [splice] her sweet [splice] can. [splice] — o I grab her — [splice] sweet can. [splice] Oh, just thinking about [splice] her [splice] can [splice] I just wish I had her — [splice] sweet [splice] sweet [splice] s-s-sweet [splice] can.

Jones: So, Mr. Simpson: you admit you grabbed her can. What do you have to say in your defense?

Homer: [looking lustful in a clearly-paused VCR shot]

Jones: Mr. Simpson, your silence will only incriminate you further. [paused shot of Homer grows larger] No, Mr. Simpson, don't take your anger out on me. Get back! Get back! Mist — Mr. Simpson — nooo!

Man: [quickly] Dramatization — may not have happened.

As you can see, the Simpson family is just like you and me. Except they're yellow and cartoons. Heh heh. I'm Troy McClure, saying tune in next week for more Simpson mayhem right here on the Opinion page.

Holidays not just food anymore; family more important part of season

Thanksgiving.

Ahh. One of the best holidays. It's the one holiday where you can eat till you are sick, sleep if off, and start all over again. No one is there hovering over you, wondering how many more seconds you are going to pile onto your plate, because they are too busy fighting everyone else for that last piece of pie.

That's what I love about Turkey Day.

At least, it used to be the main thing I loved about the holiday. But as I have grown older, it is no longer just about the stuffing and gravy. It's about being able to spend time with my family and waking up after a couple hours of napping to hear 20 people shouting answers to a board game I've never heard of.

That's what Thanksgiving is about. Family. It's the one time of year we can all get together, and it's not because of a death or because we have to exchange presents. We can just be.

And each year at this time, I prepare myself for the same line of questioning that every relative will ask me: "So, what's your major? Where do you live? How do you like K-State? Do you have a boyfriend yet?"

And every year the answers are the same, just like the questions. But it's become part of the holiday tradition.

And every year, I learn things about my family that I didn't know before, or that I really didn't want to know.

Such as, "Remember the time you got naked and..." as my uncle speaks to my dad. Yeah, anything with my dad and the word naked in the same sentence, I don't need to know about. That's when I cover my ears and hum so that I am not scarred for life by any visual pictures that may enter my head.

While some only get the chance to endure the whole process once, I on the other hand get to experience it twice. My parents are divorced, and so every year I get to have two Thanksgiving dinners. That's one of the perks, I guess. And every year I get to repeat, "Advertising, in an apartment, I love it, and no," to both my mom and dad's side of family.

You have to love it, though.

Just when you think you are nothing like your family, or just when you forgot how truly weird they are, you are thrown back into reality.

For instance, I had completely forgotten about my sister's fetish of using a new razor every day until I stepped into the shower and felt the hard piece of BIC plastic stab me in the foot. Then a flash of blue fell onto my other foot, which caused the other five razors to come tumbling down like dominoes. Some things will never change.

She still hasn't learned to throw her old razors away, and probably never will. But I think the day I get into the shower and am not surrounded by blue razors, I would miss it. It just wouldn't be the same.

As I sat eating my favorite foods, I looked around at all of my many relatives and thought, this is what I am thankful for. This is what Thanksgiving is really about.

Wildcats' schedule reason for bad showing in BCS poll

Editor,

I would definitely have to agree with the opinion of the Collegian editorial board in saying that the BCS is about money and prestige. Unfortunately for the Wildcats it looks as if they will be traveling to yet another not-so-prestigious bowl. However, I must say K-State has not earned the right to compete against a top team in a prestigious bowl.

Take the perspective of Marshall University, an 11-0 football team. They will be locked out of the BCS just like poor K-State. If you look at the AP top 25, you'll see they are ranked behind eight other teams with losses, including the Cats. Why is it that an undefeated team gets shut out of the title game? This happened to Tulane University last year. Now, I know Marshall and Tulane aren't your traditional football powerhouses, but they seem to have just as much of a claim to a title game as Nebraska, Wisconsin or K-State.

I guess in the end it just comes down to strength of schedule. Poor Marshall and K-State are just going to have to learn that you can't fool the computers when it comes to playing weaker schools. If KU were more of a football power, maybe we'd help the Cats out some. Oh well. See you on the basketball court.

Snyder should reconsider passing up Cotton Bowl bid

Editor,

Recently I've heard rumors that head coach Bill Snyder would rebuff any invitation to the Cotton Bowl due to the snub we suffered last year. I suggest that if this rumor is true, although I cannot imagine it is, we all join in asking Snyder to reconsider. There are many reasons. First, the Cotton is the more prestigious of the choices, assuming the other is the Holiday Bowl. The Cotton falls on Jan. 1, and would be more accessible to those of us who wish to be there in person. The Holiday Bowl is on Dec. 29.

Secondly, a snub from us would rule out any future bid from the Cotton Bowl. This would be a grave risk.

Most importantly, it would give those media jerks, who already give us a bad rap, more fodder for the how-whiny-is-K-State columns they have enjoyed so much in the past. Do the classy thing. Accept the invitation if it is forthcoming, go to Dallas and whip a Southeastern Conference team.

Young generation must stop blaming problems on others

Editor,

In the Nov. 30 issue of the Collegian, Danedri Thompson questioned Tom Brokaw's characterization of the World War II generation as the "greatest generation." She bases her argument on two points, the first being the "many, old white men" she knows who "still use racist language." This is one of the biggest problems with your generation — its unwillingness to attack an issue as anything other than something foisted on it by others.

If racism was strictly an issue of old men, we could all just sit around complaining about it for a few more years — as your generation is wont to do — and wait for it to die or fade away like an old soldier. But the fact is, racism is as young and multi-colored as the world population it poisons. The inability to recognize that fact only serves to preserve and strengthen it, for bigotry feeds on ignorance. I saw on the news that there is a battle between Albanian and Latino youths at a New Jersey high school in which students in both groups have died. Apparently the old white guy responsible for the violence is still at large.

No, Thompson, your grandparents' generation was not perfect. And like people of any generation, they cling to beliefs that don't always fit in with what we know and believe in today. But tragically, racism is still young and vital — it is white, brown, black and every other color in the skin rainbow. As long as members of your generation keep blaming everything that is wrong with their world on everyone else, nothing will ever get better.

Speaker offers explanations for environmental problems

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Environmentalists and members of the agriculture community need to work together to solve problems, Kansas Secretary of Agriculture Jamie Clover Adams said Tuesday.

"What is at the heart of this issue is two words — balance and stewardship," Clover Adams said.

She discussed water contaminants and talked about the amount of contaminants that are OK in drinking water.

"I think there is a misperception about how big the problem is," Clover Adams said. "I think it was a problem when there was 10 to 15 to 20 parts per billing in the water, and I think people were right to be concerned. But producers really have been working really hard, and the average is less than three parts per billing, which is the drinking-water standard."

Throughout her speech, sponsored by the Agri-Women's club, Clover Adams said issues affecting the state of Kansas' water supply are not as simple as they appear to be.

"It is not the mega-large facilities causing the problem. It is the mom-and-dad farms watering cattle in the stream like mom and dad always did," she said.

Clover Adams discussed Gov. Bill Graves' Water Quality Initiative. One of the focal points of the plan is the Kansas-Lower Republican River Basin.

She said the plan is to identify areas of water not up to state standards. The second point in the governor's initiative is to prioritize areas that need to be looked at and addressed first. Other areas of interest in the plan include devising a plan that identifies sources and outlines a strategy for water-quality improvement.

One of the challenges Clover Adams said she encounters in her job is trying to get farmers to look into the future.

"I try to talk to them and get them to look beyond today, but what is looming out there tomorrow," Clover Adams said.

Environmental plans can be difficult to implement because of a lack of funds, and she said it easy to place to the blame on those in the agriculture industry, but she said consumers need to change their living habits.

Carolyn Kleiber, co-owner of Ag-Service Inc., said she agreed, and said Clover Adams brings a lot of good experience to the office.

"Jamie comes with a very good background of state agriculture as well as knowing the ins and outs of the system," Kleiber said.

Exxon, Mobil merger approved

BY H. JOSEF HEBERT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Exxon and Mobil moved swiftly Tuesday to conclude their $81 billion merger after federal regulators cleared the way — with conditions — for the deal creating the world's largest privately owned oil company.

The merger reunites two of the biggest remnants of the 1911 government breakup of John D. Rockefeller's Standard Oil empire.

Company officials said they would comply with government requirements that the new oil giant sell 2,413 of its nearly 16,000 gas stations, specifically those in the Northeast, Texas and California, as well as a refinery and other assets.

"This settlement should preserve competition and protect consumers from inappropriate and anticompetitive price increases," said Federal Trade Commission Chairman Robert Pitofsky.

"Exxon and Mobil have accepted terms and conditions specified by the FTC and will comply fully and in a timely manner," Exxon Chairman Lee Raymond said in a statement only hours after the FTC gave its conditional approval to the deal, concluding a yearlong review.

Within minutes of the FTC action, executives of the two companies filed papers in New Jersey and Delaware, where Exxon and Mobil had been registered, officially creating Exxon-Mobil, a company producing 3.8 percent of the world's oil with 120,000 employees and $138 billion in assets.

The New York Stock Exchange announced that the Exxon and Mobil symbols would be scrapped, and the new company would be traded under an Exxon-Mobil symbol.

Without the conditions the FTC imposed, the agency said, the new company would violate antitrust laws and significantly injure competition in some parts of the country. So the commissioners voted 4-0 to approve a settlement requiring Exxon, the country's largest oil company, and Mobil, the second largest, to sell off assets where they dominate markets.

Sports, life give several reasons to be thankful

CHRISTOPHER McLEMORE

As the football season winds down, the Wildcats are left with the less-than-glamorous task of choosing between the Culligan Holiday Bowl and the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl.

In case you need a little pick-me-up here between the Campus Fourum and the Cryptoquip to keep your mind off of possible bowl bids, I've created my list of things to be thankful for. I'm not late for Thanksgiving, I'm just early for next year.

I'm thankful for Virginia Tech's 1.54 point lead over Nebraska in the BCS poll, even if it means a worse bowl bid for K-State.

I'm thankful for finally having men's basketball players who are more likely to get a double-double than criminal felony charges. It's nice to go to a game and not have to pay extra for tickets so the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics can post bail for one of the starters.

I'm thankful for the New Orleans Saints' player who claims that his on-field celebratory gesture isn't a throat slash but a motion to praise God.

I'm thankful for the K-State livestock judging team, championship or not.

I'm thankful for the slim chance that the K-State baseball team can actually play a home game this year.

I'm thankful for the Cleveland Indians, who can cause a Kansas City Royals fan immense pain during the regular season, but can cause great joy by continually floundering in the post-season.

I'm thankful for Korene Hinds, Amy Mortimer, Annie Wetterhus and the rest of the cross country team for finally getting a women's sports team on the front page.

I'm thankful for the guy who gave Master P a chance in the NBA, and more thankful for the guy who subsequently took that chance away.

I'm thankful for the photographer who just happened to have a telephoto lens moments after Brandi Chastain scored the game-winning goal in the Women's World Cup.

I'm thankful for the designers at Nike who decided that Nike needed a new line of sports bras just months before the Women's World Cup.

I'm thankful for the Chinese goalie who allowed the shot by Chastain that let the guy with the camera show us close-ups of the new Nike sports bra line.

I'm thankful for teams that try to play soft against Quincy Morgan, and the guys who think they can arm tackle Joe Hall. I love the guys who try and make their mama proud by lining up opposite of Darren Howard and the quarterbacks who think they can side-step a blitzing Mark Simoneau.

I'm thankful for Eric Wimmer, who probably is flunking out of college because he spent the entire first half of the semester filling my e-mail account with hate mail.

I'm thankful for "SportsCenter" highlights of Tampa Bay games that focus exclusively on Martin Gramatica.

I'm thankful for everyone who thinks they have the funniest darn joke about a guy wearing a bow tie.

I'm thankful for the Houston Rockets' 4-11 record.

I'm thankful for the Denver Broncos' 4-7 record.

I'm thankful for the K-State football team's 10-1 record (not quite perfect, but better than most had predicted).

As for the future, I'll be thankful when Boomer Esiason gets fired from announcing Monday Night Football, when Keith Jackson starts doing national broadcasts again, and when someone tracks down the Colorado field goal kicker and throws a punch that doesn't miss wide right.

I'll be thankful when I win the lottery, when the Royals win a home game and when the football team wins some respect.

I'll be thankful when Temple and Akron go 10-1 so K-State's strength of schedule isn't in the double digits.

I'll be thankful when Tom Asbury gets some credit and when his critics quit calling the Campus Fourum.

I'll be thankful when Anna Kournikova finally falls for redheads, and when Carmen Electra realizes that tattoos aside, there's nothing that Dennis Rodman's got that I ain't got.

Oh, yeah. That warm food, cozy shelter and nice family stuff is pretty nice too.

K-State dominates early in 89-45 rout of Eastern Michigan

BY SARAH CRAIG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Eleven Wildcats scored in Tuesday night's 89-45 win against the Eastern Michigan Eagles, led by senior center Angie Finkes, who recorded a double-double at Bramlage Coliseum.

Finkes grabbed 10 of the team's 47 boards and scored 19 points, followed by guard Kim Woodlee, who scored 17 points, hitting five of 10 three pointers.

The Cats used the Eagles' zone defense to their advantage, hitting 12 of 33 shots from behind the arc.

"I was really pleased with our execution offensively against the zone defense," head coach Deb Patterson said. "That's something that we hadn't seen much of, and I was concerned going in and I liked our answer. I felt we got the ball both inside and outside, and I think that's critical and something we hadn't really done well last year."

K-State controlled the game from tipoff, leading 41-20 at halftime. The Cats returned in the second half for a 13-4 run in the first five minutes, started by a three-pointer from Woodlee.

Woodlee's career high is 26 points — against Eastern Michigan last year.

"I've been more open against this team than I ever have been against any team," Woodlee said. "I really didn't think that it would happen twice in a row. I was really surprised to see that I did get open looks."

The Cats shot 47.8 percent from the floor and 78.6 percent from the free-throw line, while holding the Eagles to just 28.8-percent shooting from the floor.

"They have a really strong, aggressive zone, and they dove as soon as we caught the ball inside," Finkes said. "We have super-great shooters, so it was easy, just get it in their hands and they'd relocate it, got right in the spot, it was good,"

Eastern Michigan struggled with 19 turnovers compared to the Cats' 10.

Two Cats shot 50 percent from three-point range— Woodlee and sophomore guard Kristin Rethman. Patterson said she was happy with the team's offensive efforts but wanted better rebounding.

"Defensively, I thought we did a good job on most possessions, but I think the one area that I wasn't completely satisfied with was our defensive rebounding," Patterson said. "I think we let Eastern Michigan stay too even with us on offensive board numbers. We didn't get enough, and they got too many, so that's one area where I think we need to continue to make progress."

K-State forward Nicky Ramage lays up a shot against Eastern Michigan University on Tuesday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

Woodlee said watching her teammates come off the bench to score was a high point of the game.

"The work ethic of the people that we have on our team is unbelievable and it was so gratifying to see them," Woodlee said. "It was great."

Junior point guard April Sailors dished out six assists but couldn't hit the three, shooting 0-4 from behind the arc. Back-up point Morgen Finneran played 15 minutes, donating four points, two rebounds and three assists in the win.

Patterson said this performance proved the Cats can succeed against a zone defense.

"If they want to play the zone, I feel great about our ability on the inside and outside to be effective, because we've got some tremendous shooters," Patterson said.

"Now we're starting to see that although April is struggling a little bit right now, I think she's more in a drought than anything on the perimeter, that Morgen is stepping up, so we've got three-point shooters we can depend on if we do play the zone."

The Wildcats return to action 7 p.m. Friday at Bramlage Coliseum, against Alabama State in the first round of the Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic, which concludes Saturday.

Cats look to limit miscues against Billikens tonight

BY JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Wildcats get back under way tonight against the St. Louis Billikens at Bramlage Coliseum, in what will be their second game of three this week.

Coming off an 11-point victory against the defending Southland Conference Champions Texas-San Antonio on Monday, the Cats (2-1) will look to focus on improving their ball handling skills against what should prove to be one of the tougher non-conference opponents in the Billikens (2-1).

K-State turned the ball over an astounding 27 times against UTSA, just a week after turning it over 25 times against Northwestern State.

"We need someone to steady the ship at point guard," assistant coach Mark Fox said. "After that, we need them expand in other areas. It'll take them some time, but they are capable of doing so."

Fox attributes the Cats turnover problems to the fact that there are so many young players and new players in the program this year.

"It's tough right now for a lot of people," Fox said. "We do have a lot of new players trying to learn a new system at a higher level than what they are used to. They need to learn how to play together.

So far this season, it's been a combination at point guard in junior Galen Morrison, freshman Kenyatta Dix and senior Cortez Groves.

Dix and Groves have been playing out of position there, considering they are normally shooting guards. But Monday night the Cats received an early holiday present when sophomore Josh Kimm returned to the court for the first time this year.

Kimm, who originally was supposed to be out for the season, played just six minutes against UTSA.

As far as St. Louis goes, they are led by new head coach Lorenzo Romar, who coached at Pepperdine, compiling a 42-44 record there.

Offensively, senior guard Justin Love leads the way. In the Billikens' three games this year, Love has posted 17.8 points per contest, as well as six assists per game.

Fox said St. Louis boasts a solid inside attack and will be an opponent that will help the Cats for future play this year. Chris Heinrich, a 6-foot-11-inch junior center, has averaged 6.3 points a game and 5.5 rebounds. Also in the paint is 6-7 junior forward Justin Tatum, who has averaged 12.3 points and 9.3 rebounds.

"They're a good basketball team," Fox said. "They're talented and have good inside players with some good size. They're also a team that can be good preparation for the rest of the season."

Matching up with the post threats of the Billikens will be senior Tony Kitt, who's averaged nearly 14 points per game, as well as 10 rebounds a game.

Leading the way offensively for K-State is Groves, with an average of 14.3 points. Against UTSA, Groves poured in a career-high 24 points and was four-of-seven from beyond the arc.

"He did a lot beside scoring," Fox said. "He played very solid in a lot of ways. He had five assists, and just turned the ball over twice. He played the way we expect him to play because he is a very gifted athlete."

LSU talks to Bennett, chooses to hire Saban

BY MARY FOSTER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BATON ROUGE, La. — K-State defensive coordinator Phil Bennett is staying put.

Bennett, who's guided the No. 7 Wildcats to a No. 4 national ranking in defense, interviewed for the head coaching position at LSU on Nov. 24, but it was Nick Saban who was hired Tuesday. Saban leaves a Michigan State program that's posted a 9-2 record this season with a CompUSA Florida Citrus Bowl appearance awaiting.

Saban became one of college football's highest paid coaches when he signed a five-year contract for about $1.2 million annually. The only college football coaches to earn more are Florida's Steve Spurrier and Florida State's Bobby Bowden.

"Nick Saban's career has been committed to mastering the game of football and his record of success, I think, speaks for itself," chancellor Mark Emmert said at a news conference.

Saban succeeds Gerry DiNardo and joins a school that has a long football tradition but a record of two straight losing seasons.

He guided No. 10 Michigan State to a second-place finish in the Big 10. It is unclear if he will coach the Spartans in the Citrus Bowl. He said that will be an administrative decision.

At least one Spartan player does not expect Saban to coach at the Jan. 1 bowl game.

"I got the feeling that he wasn't going to be around for it," linebacker Josh Thornhill said after meeting with the coach Tuesday in East Lansing, Mich. "It's disappointing. I would have rather had a coach stick around for all four years."

Trapshooting Club to conduct informational meeting

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This year, K-State added the Trapshooting Club to its long list of campus organizations.

Aaccording to trapshooting team president Jeff King, sophomore in agricultural education, this club will be one receiving a lot of student interest.

"I run into people all the time that say they know five or six people that would want to join," King said. "I know as soon as we get the word out that there will be a lot of people interested."

The Trapshooting Club will have its first meeting tonight at 6 in Union 203. King encourages anyone interested to attend and said experience is by no means a prerequisite.

King and Matt Gugle, sophomore in feed science, formed the organization, getting approval from the Student Governing Association.

Since then, King said he already has at least 20 students interested in joining the club. He said the organization's goal is to get as many people involved as possible.

"We want to bring together trapshooting as a sport," King said. "We want to put enough people together to consistently take people to a lot of different shoots."

Despite the newness of the club to K-State, King has high aspirations for the organization's success.

"We want to be able to compete in more of the collegiate shoots and eventually compete for the national title," he said.

In early June, King and four other K-State students traveled to Wichita to compete in the collegiate division of the Kansas Trapshooting Association state shoot. The group was awarded first place, which King said will provide motivation to achieve greater goals over the course of the season.

Most importantly, King said the club will allow many students to get involved in a sport they enjoy.

"I don't see it as ever being a varsity sport," he said, "but it does give a lot of people an opportunity to shoot."

Campus groups plan combined holiday performance

By KELLY EVENSON
Kansas State Collegian

Bells, brass and choirs will start the holiday season at K-State and in Manhattan when several campus groups combine to perform a holiday concert Sunday.

The Holiday Festival of Music will be at 7:30 p.m. Sunday at the First United Methodist Church on Poyntz Ave.

Rod Walker, director of choral activities at K-State, said the K-State choir, chorale, the K-State brass and trumpet ensembles and the Rhapsody Ringers will be performing at the festival. He said the concert is a favorite among its participants and the community.

"It's a nice performance that a lot of students go to," Walker said. "The audience sings carols, and it is a nice way to kick off the Christmas season before going into finals week."

Walker said for the past 10 years, the holiday concert has been at the church because of its good acoustics for the musical pieces. The church also has an organ and can seat about 1,500 people. In years past, he said the free concert has been standing room only.

"We don't want to keep people out at Christmas by charging them admission," Walker said. "It is the best place in town to sing acoustically, and it has the best setting for the holidays."

Rhapsody Ringers, a bell choir out of First United Methodist, also will perform at the holiday festival. Judy Scharmann, director of the choir, said there is a 35-year tradition of bell choirs at the church. She said the choir, one of five performing Sunday, is primarily composed of K-State students.

"This is one of our highlights of the year," Scharmann said. "It is very spiritual, and it begins the holiday season just right."

Scharmann said most of the ringers in the choir have had previous experience in high school with bell choirs. She said they practice once a week for an hour and a half on music for concerts throughout the year. Music for the holiday concert was begun about mid-semester.

"We are so thrilled to be a part of this concert," Scharmann said. "All of the students are so pleased to be able to participate because of the excitement and anticipation of the event."

Scharmann also said the holiday festival is quickly becoming a tradition for many Manhattan families. She said many will start their Christmas festivities by attending the concert.

"Lots of families in the area start their season with the concert," she said. "Just to experience the sounds and sights and to hear the beautiful music is a treat. It's a wonderful variety."

Because of the popularity of the performance, Walker said his best suggestion is to get there early to get a seat. He said the holiday season and its association with brass, bells and choirs has led to its gaining excitement in Manhattan.

"It's one of the favorite concerts of the year because of its holiday theme," Walker said. "It gives people a good feeling when they leave because of its traditional Christmas fare."

Scans suggest brain damage in Gulf War illness sufferers

By BRENDA C. COLEMAN
The Associated Press

CHICAGO — Brain scans of soldiers who believe they suffer from Gulf War illness suggest they have brain damage, possibly from chemicals they were exposed to, researchers reported Tuesday.

The researchers said veterans who report symptoms had lower levels of a certain brain chemical than healthy veterans of the 1991 conflict.

"This is the first time ever we have proof of brain damage in sick Gulf War veterans," said the lead researcher, Dr. James L. Fleckenstein, professor of radiology at the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center in Dallas.

"They can be believed — they're not malingering, they're not depressed, they're not stressed. There's a hope for treatment and there's hope for being able to monitor the progress of the disease."

A Pentagon spokesman, Rear Adm. Craig Quigley, said he looked forward to examining the research. "I hope he's right" that chemical exposure is the answer, Quigley said. "We need to take a look at it."

The researchers reported that magnetic resonance spectroscopy revealed that veterans who believe they have the illness have lower-than-normal levels of a chemical in the brain stem and basal ganglia.

PROTESTERS

milled about for several hours in the ornate theater until WTO officials finally gave up and canceled the opening speeches.

The protesters are unhappy with the Geneva-based organization that sets the rules for global trade, charging that it too often only considers the needs of giant multinational corporations at the expense of protecting the environment and worker rights.

A surprised administration official conceded late Tuesday night that the protesters might have won the opening round of the four days of discussions. He said Clinton would succeed in seizing the policy highground Wednesday with a speech on the benefits of tearing down trade barriers.

"The president is very much looking forward to his visit here, to speaking to the people of Seattle, to the people of the United States," Gene Sperling, the president's chief economic adviser, told reporters at the WTO site late Tuesday night.

The Clinton administration has pushed for the WTO to consider environmental and worker safeguards when trade agreements are negotiated. More than 100 of the WTO's 135 member nations are developing countries who have vowed to resist including these items in the upcoming round of global negotiations expected to be launched at these meetings.

Police fired tear gas and red-pepper spray at roving bands of protesters throughout the day and well into the night. The goal after dark appeared to be clearing out a huge safety zone around the WTO sites and the hotel where Clinton was staying.

Mayor Paul Schell declared a civil emergency and imposed a curfew from 7 p.m. PST to 7:30 a.m. PST, a period that will cover Clinton's scheduled arrival.

Clinton picked Seattle as the event site because no other state in the country owes as many jobs to international trade — one of three — thanks in part to exporting giants Boeing and Microsoft.

Washington Gov. Gary Locke said he decided to call in as many as 200 unarmed members of the National Guard and up to 300 state troopers to provide relief to weary Seattle police.

"It's really critical that that we provide some relief for local law enforcement, many of whom have been on duty for more than 24 hours," the governor told reporters.

Disappointed WTO officials scrapped the opening ceremony after waiting for three hours to see if the demonstrations would let up enough to allow delegates and speakers to make it to the meeting site.

Instead, the WTO went straight into the first of a series of plenary sessions, where trade ministers from different countries are allowed to address the delegates.

A disappointed WTO Director General Mike Moore vowed that, despite the rocky start, the assembled nations would succeed in launching a new round of multinational trade negotiations to lower tariffs and other barriers on agriculture products, manufactured goods and service industries such as banking and insurance.

"This conference will be a success. The issues are far too important to be ignored," Moore said.

SHELTER

commended," said Jake Mosier, chairman of the funding committee.

Mosier said the committee's proposal would add two small areas where visitors could become acquainted with potential pets. In addition, a quarantine area for sick animals would help the shelter avoid the spread of infectious disease.

During the winter, Stoddard said animals have been tied to trees after the shelter has closed. Before they could be attended to by staff members in the morning, these animals would freeze to death.

The committee's solution to this problem is a night-drop area where stray animals could safely be deposited. Mosier said this area would contain three indoor cages accessible from outside the facility.

"These three additions are hoped to encourage adoptions and safety of the public's pets," Mosier said.

The animal shelter, established in 1988, serves Manhattan, Ogden, Emmett, and Leonardville, and Pottawatomie and Riley counties. This 2,220-square-foot building handles about 2,000 animals each year.

Out of 1,962 dog and cat admissions in 1998, 476 were rescued by owners, 750 were adopted and 736 were euthanized.

Shelter supervisor Jody Kingery-Page said the increased kennel space created by this project should allow for adoptions to increase, and euthanasia to decrease.

"The design is leaps and bounds from where we are now," Kingery-Page said. "The next building will be more inviting. Now, it's almost like a jail."

Stoddard said that in order to acquire the additional funds, help from the surrounding communities and corporate agencies is necessary. She said contributions made to the shelter are tax deductible and certain levels of donations will be honored through naming opportunities.

People who are thinking of donating money to the cause should look at the project from a pet-owner standpoint, Kingery-Page said. He said it's an issue of civic pride.

"Those who like their pets and others can appreciate the problem of stray animals," Mosier said. "I'm not an advocate of pets, but as a civic-minded person, I'm going to support it.

"The three additions have been approved by the city provided we have funding," Mosier said. "This is a short campaign. If we don't realize the goal, funds will be raised to do what we can toward the three structures."

Stoddard said the committee would like to work the additions into the current plan if the committee has the funds in hand. She said the project will start during the spring and continue throughout the remainder of the year.

"People should make donations as soon as possible," Stoddard said. "This is a way for people who are supporters of animals to help out with the project."

Readying for Rapture

Pastor Robert Berry of the Manhattan United Pentecostal Church speaks Tuesday night in the K-State Student Union on the second coming of Christ. Whether one is ready for the rapture is the most important issue facing K-State right now, Berry said, although people will spend more time shopping for cars or doing homework.

Speaker says preparing to meet God most important priority

BY SHANNON DELMEZ
Kansas State Collegian

No one knows the day or hour of the coming rapture, but it is coming and everyone must be ready for it, said Pastor Robert Berry of the United Pentecostal Church in Manhattan.

Berry spoke to the Campus Spirit Ministry on Tuesday night and addressed this idea. He said the rapture now is the most important consideration in life, not the concern of buying a new car or of an upcoming final exam.

"Are we ready for the rapture?" Berry said. "What is the rapture? We want to get you ready to meet God. We don't want you left behind."

The rapture, according to Berry, is the transporting of a person from one place to another, usually to heaven. He also mentioned several examples from the Bible to explain this idea.

"You have Noah being taken up out of the flood. You also have Lot being taken out of destruction way before the destruction came. Paul was taken up into heaven and saw things that we're not lawful to speak," Berry said.

Berry began his speech with a prayer to ask God to allow his listeners to understand the message. Then he dove into the question of the evening.

Everything that is supposed to happen before the second coming of Christ has happened, Berry said. He said that because of this, the rapture is near.

He also said that with so many different churches, it is hard to know what is the right message.

"There's only one message," Berry said. "Jesus said to preach this to every nation. Everything we teach is based on the word of God. This is not personal opinion."

Many of the audience members said they came to the speech not to learn the answers to Berry's question, but to hear what they already believe is true.

"I wanted to hear the word of God, and for the most part, it was from the word," audience member Monica Ingram said. "I know that it was true, because he had scripture to back it up. I believe in the Bible. I felt like it was all true."

Berry discussed the ideas of others in accordance to the second coming of Jesus.

"There are a lot of false ideas about the coming of the Lord right now, and it's a very hot topic for this time," he said. "I'm not one of those who says the Lord will come before the year 2000. Jesus said no one knows the day or the hour."

Samuel and Mia Corcimiglia, faculty advisers for Campus Spirit Ministry and members of the United Pentecostal Church, said topics such as the rapture are chosen because they are the basic beliefs of the church.

"The students who go to the church formed the group," Samuel Corcimiglia said. "The topic was the message of the gospel's salvation to individuals preparing themselves for eternity."

Emily Savary, sophomore in electrical engineering and the president of Campus Spirit Ministry, said the message was important because people take for granted what is in the Bible.

"It brought out a lot of areas that most people don't think about or don't realize are true or that are biblical," she said. "It was a real awareness. He's one of the wisest people that I know personally. He can open the scripture and explain it in a way that people can understand it even if they don't have a knowledge of it. I think that it's important that people listen to it and that people are aware of what is actually in the Bible."

Bible study allows greek students opportunity to worship

BY COLLEGIAN STAFF

ZOE, a spin-off of K-State's chapter of Campus Crusade for Christ, started as an organization for K-State's greek community.

The organization, a form of Bible study, meets at 7 p.m. every Monday at the Chi Omega sorority house in order to allow members of fraternities and sororities a separate kind of worship.

"The focus is greeks, and it focuses us with a unity and purpose to reach out to the greeks struggling with the same pressures we all have," Matt Shepherd, senior in finance, said. "They are the same struggles any student would deal with. As a greek house, you're living it."

However, the growing popularity of the group's Monday night meetings has allowed ZOE to expand to include any K-State student interested in joining.

"It began as a small Bible study for greek students, and it just exploded," Shepherd said. "We had 100 students sometimes."

ZOE, a Greek word meaning "spiritual life," is advertised through announcements in K-State's greek houses and residence halls. Shepherd said he was drawn to the group by his desire to share his experiences with fellow greeks.

"I was looking for a group of fellow college students that really was going through the same things I was at the time — just the stresses and the pressures of going through college and trying to live your life with character still," Shepherd said. "It's just been a place that would take you as you are. You could come with the weight of everything on your shoulders and never have to put on a show."

Shepherd said his introduction to ZOE has spurred him to bring many friends to meetings, whether or not they were affiliated with a greek house.

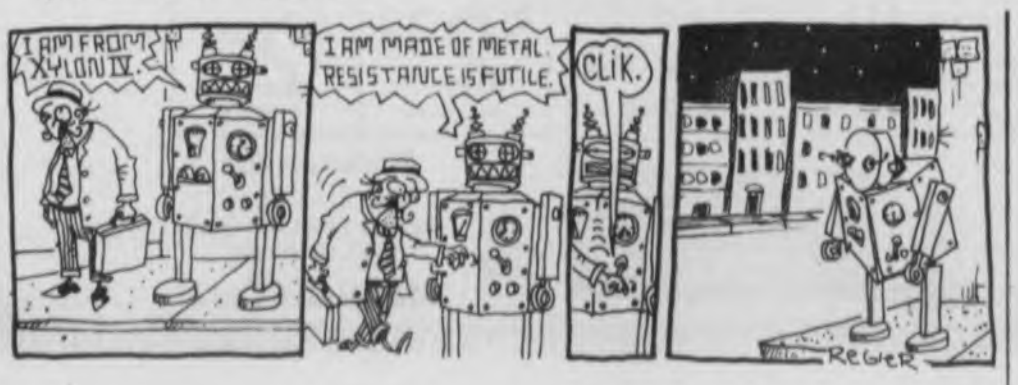
"I have taken several non-greek students," he said. "Everyone is by all means welcome. It would be contradictory from our beliefs to be exclusive."

Lindsay Miller, sophomore in mass communications, said telling friends about ZOE has been an important factor in its growth.

"Word of mouth is pretty important in getting people to come most of the time. It isn't just another Bible study," Miller said. "There are all types of people who attend. We really try to make everybody feel welcome."

Miller said meetings consist of shared readings and discussions, skits that introduces the topic for the evening, and a speaker who comes and addresses a special issue of choice.

"We talk about how God might view our failures and how we feel about it. We divide into small groups and we just talk about it and we end in prayer," Shepherd said. "We just encourage everyone to come and express how they're feeling and where they're at. We try to keep it really informal."



ZOE can be a big help to members of the greek community, Shepherd said.

"I think the most important thing ZOE does for the campus is it gives a light to one of the darkest facets of college," he said. "The greek system is kind of known for more trials and temptations, and it gives greeks a real opportunity to come together with those frustrations and say we're not in it alone. Even though the greek system may be known for negative things, we want to revolutionize it for more positive things and say it's really known for building positive character."

One event ZOE members are looking forward to is a conference in Denver on Jan. 3-8. Miller said the conference will feature a variety of speakers and allow ZOE members a great deal of worship time.

"We're just so on fire about it and excited about what God can do at these conventions," she said. "For some people, events like this can be a turning point for them in their faith."

MEXICO

Attorney General Jorge Madrazo said in a television interview that investigators suspect the victims were killed by the Juarez drug cartel, once Mexico's largest cocaine smuggling outfit. He said more than 100 people could be buried on the ranches just across the border from El Paso, Texas, with 22 believed to be U.S. citizens.

"We believe these people were killed for their knowledge or for being witnesses to drug trafficking," Assistant FBI Director Thomas Pickard said in Washington, D.C. "Most of the information we have shows these individuals were buried there at least two to three years ago, so it's not a recent situation."

Authorities were led to the ranches by an informant who approached the FBI early this year, a federal law enforcement official said in Washington.

The informant said there might be as many as 100 bodies there, including people who had been providing information to U.S. drug agents, according to the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Eighteen-year-old Rodrigo Falcon said his family had been taking care of one of the ranches for the property owner.

Other nearby residents, who refused to give their names, said they had seen parties at the ranch in the past, but it had seemed abandoned recently. While there were stables for horses, the only animal visible was a scrawny dog.

Pickard said digging began late Monday and part of one body had been recovered by midday Tuesday. Sixty-eight FBI agents and forensic experts and other U.S. personnel were at the ranches, he said.

"We've been discussing this for a period of time with the Mexicans," he said. "We've been getting outstanding cooperation from Mexico."

Pickard said elaborate preparations were required to decide where to start digging, to secure the sites and to "make sure we thoroughly cover the sites with ground-piercing radar," using techniques the FBI developed in Kosovo. The FBI sent forensic teams to Kosovo twice this year to exhume bodies in a search for evidence of war crimes by Serbs.

In Washington, President Clinton said he had not received confirmation that 22 Americans were among the suspected victims but condemned the killings as a horrible example of the excesses of Mexico's drug cartels.

"I think it reinforces the imperative of our trying not only to protect our border but to work with the Mexican authorities to try to combat these (drug cartels)," Clinton said.

Pickard said it was a pretty good assumption that Americans are among those buried at the ranches, given the proximity to the border.

At its height, the Juarez cartel was so powerful that it had the chief of Mexico's anti-narcotics forces, Gen. Jesus Gutierrez Rebollo — along with many lower-ranking officers — on its payroll, Mexican prosecutors say. Gutierrez Rebollo was arrested in 1997 and sentenced to 32 years in prison.

The 1997 death of cartel leader Amado Carillo Fuentes, after plastic surgery designed to help him evade law enforcement, set off a bloody fight for control of the cartel's drug routes.

Police in both countries have arrested many of the group's alleged ringleaders and the cartel has been eclipsed by other trafficking organizations with which it had feuded.

The local International Association of Relatives and Friends of Missing Persons says 196 people were missing since 1990 in the Ciudad Juarez-El Paso area, the newspaper El Diario de Juarez said.

Late Monday, Madrazo's office said: "In the last four years, and possibly over more time, citizens of both nationalities have disappeared without leaving any trace" in the Ciudad Juarez area.

Two relatives showed up Tuesday at the concrete wall around Rancho de la Campana. Santos Alonso Aguilar said two men came to their home in Ciudad Juarez on May 23, 1998, and took away his 33-year-old brother Jose, an auto body repairman.

"They had the look of those who are dressed like this," Santos Alonso said, pointing toward Mexican police.

"For more than two years, we have heard nothing of him," said another brother, Roman. "They should give us an answer now."

Santos said, "I hope my brother isn't here."

The Mexico's attorney general's office gave two phone numbers for people to call to pass along information or to inquire about missing family members: (800) 338-5856 and (800) 716-7852.

grave consequences."

Hyde said he will try to make people focus on what is important as the United States moves into a new period.

"I will underscore the necessity for elevating those things we cherish, those things we believe, above cynicism to a level of high virtue," he said.

Reagan said he hopes students will attend the lecture. The lecture is free and open to the public.

"He'll be very interesting, and I would certainly urge students to attend," he said.

Rec Report

Recreational Services' Office Located in Peters Recreation Complex

Intramural Sports Program

With over 40 intramural sports offered a year, the Rec Complex is the place to be when it comes to participating in organized sports. Rec Service's intramural program caters to 20,000 participants a year, a statistic that takes into account the number of sports participants, not individual people.

K-State intramurals are divided into five leagues: fraternity, men's independent, men's residence hall, women and co-rec. The fraternity, independent and residence hall leagues combine to compete for the men's all university championship.

With so many sports offered, it is hard to pinpoint the most popular sport among participants, but flag football, volleyball, basketball and softball are all favorites among students. Last year, softball had the most number of participants with a little over 4,000.

"Co-rec softball is probably the most popular sport," Steve Martini, Associate Director-Intramurals and Outside Facilities, said.

Women's participation in intramurals is good and the playing level is high. According to Martini, girls' high school sports programs are very good in Kansas; consequently, the level of competition is high for those who still want to compete in their favorite sports.

"At KSU, I think intramurals are very competitive," Stephanie Settle, senior in math education and intramural participant, said. "Everyone is out for a good time, but I would say most teams are out to win too."

There are other benefits besides competition that comes with participating in intramurals. It is a great way to get together with friends and to meet new people.

"I would recommend intramurals to anyone who enjoys athletics at all," Settle said.

Intramurals can range anywhere from wristwrestling, table tennis, and badminton to softball, football and basketball. It's a great way to relieve stress, have fun and get some exercise.

If you are interested in team or individual intramural sports, watch the Kansas State Collegian for specific sport sign-up dates. Also, check out our website at www.recservices.ksu.edu. Come to the Rec Business Office between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m. to register. For more information, contact Rec Services at 532-6980.

Officials

What's better than watching sports? How about getting paid to officiate sports? At the Rec, you can do that by being an official for the many intramural sports Rec Services sponsors.

Rec Services hires over 200 intramural officials a year to officiate such sports as basketball, soccer, flag football, volleyball and softball to name a few. Intramural officials' wages start at $5.60 per game. Some officials officiate a wide-variety of sports while others only officiate a sport they played in high school.

To become an official, you must attend three preseason officiating clinics. After you have completed the clinics and passed a quiz over rules of the game, you are eligible to be an official. Throughout the season, officials are expected to attend three training sessions and one play-off meeting. All training totals approximately 10 hours.

"Officiating is a great way to learn how to officiate if you are interested in officiating later in life," Steve Martini, Associate Director-Intramurals and Outdoor Facilities, said. "We train you and it doesn't cost anything. And, it provides opportunities for officiating in city and other leagues."

Pool Action

Water provides a safe and effective environment to work at high intensity without some of the risks associated with impact on land. A great benefit of water is that it has natural resistance to our movements. This in turn stimulates our cardiovascular and muscle endurance training. Training studies that have been conducted in water, indicated significant body fat loss along with significant increase in muscle strength and endurance.

My Favorite Workout

In her first few months at K-State, Sofia Ip already has made coming to the Rec a habit. Ip, an English major in the English Language Program, recently came to K-State from Panama City, Panama. She is in her first year at K-State.

In Panama, Ip enjoyed aerobics. Here in the United States, she prefers other types of exercise. Usually, Ip walks to the Rec, workouts on the step machine and bicycle and then walks home. She also lifts weights and plays tennis. Everyday she does some type of exercise.

Ip's motivation in working out at the Rec is to stay healthy and lose weight. According to her, the food in the United States is different than in Panama. Consequently, she has gained a few pounds since leaving her country.

"I am going home over Christmas and I have to lose weight before I go home to surprise my family," Ip said. "And, exercising makes me feel good, more active."

Working It Out

Get ready for semester break and work off some pre-final stress at the same time. Join us in the multipurpose room and burn some calories to make room for all the holiday food. We offer 32 sessions per week starting as early as 6:45 a.m. and as late as 8:25 p.m. Our last day for the fall semester exercise sessions will be Friday, December 10. Sessions will resume during the first week of spring classes.

Discount Offered

January and spring semester facility use cards go on sale Monday, Dec. 20, in the administrative office. A 10% discount off the monthly rate will be given when purchasing a semester card for the months of January through May.

Nutrition Notes

The holiday season is upon us! Here are a few ways to survive holiday eating while not throwing your hard work of the past 11 months down the drain. First of all, be realistic. Look to maintain your weight during the holidays. Trying to lose weight or diet over the holidays may just put a damper on your holiday cheer. Do not deprive yourself of your favorites, but watch your portion sizes and balance what you eat with other meals throughout the day. This means to eat only the foods you really want, and balance a heavier meal with a lighter one over the course of a day. And, you can treat yourself to dessert. Just make sure it is a small piece. And, last but not least, do not forget to get some physical activity into the scheme of things. You can even make an activity a new family tradition.

Fitness Facts

A new study indicates that short- and long-term androstenedione supplementation does NOT increase the amount of testosterone in the blood, or increase muscle size or strength when used during resistance training (weight lifting). Some negative side effects shown were a decrease in HDL ("good") cholesterol levels, male breast enlargement, and increased risk in pancreatic and prostate cancer.

Who's Who???

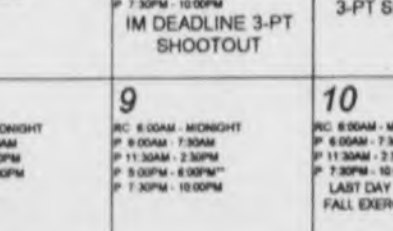
Jason Barrett, a fifth-year senior in Management Information Systems, is the System/Network Administrator at the Rec. A Topeka native, Barrett uses his computer knowledge to keep the computers at the Rec up, running and healthy, while keeping all the users happy.

Barrett, who began his job in February 1998, applied for the computer position at the Rec to gain job experience.

"Honestly, I thought the job would be very good experience. It sounded like it would be not only challenging, but fun," Barrett said.

It has been all that and more for Barrett who said the best thing about working at the Rec is the people he works with.

"They are all interesting, good friends and fun to work with," Barrett said.



Barrett is enjoying his last few days as a Rec employee as he graduates in December. Barrett and his wife Sherri are finishing the employment decision process.

Intramural Basketball

Don't miss our largest intramural sport of the year! Start organizing your teams now for the upcoming basketball season! Entries will be accepted Thursday, January 13, through Thursday, January 20. Priority on playing times is on a first-come, first-serve basis. Information sheets with league menus are available in the business office.

Bryan Hay, a senior in Accounting, is an intramural official at the Rec. The Marshalltown, Iowa, native officiates flag football, volleyball, basketball and softball in order to have fun and earn a little extra money.

Hay began officiating volleyball last year and decided to stay on as an official to officiate other sports.

"My favorite sport is basketball. I know the game better than any of the other sports. Also, I can get a decent workout running up and down the court," Hay said.

Hay's favorite aspect of being an intramural official is when he has the opportunity to officiate big games with big crowds. According to him, those games generate a lot of excitement and make the job more fun and rewarding.

Hay graduates in May 2000 and plans on staying at K-State to get his master's in Accounting while still working at the Rec as an intramural official.

As for now, Hay feels like he has learned a lot from being an official.

"It has taught me how to be assertive," he said. "Especially in officiating, if you are not assertive, you open yourself up to more problems."

Gift Buying 101

Several key points should be kept in mind when shopping for presents to enhance spirit of holiday season

ART BY BECKY WILSON AND NATHAN BROTHERS/COLLEGIAN

KEN WELLS

You can smell the friction burns on the credit cards from here. Wallets are bending and warping, ATMs are spitting out money like a petulant 2-year-old's first taste of carrots. Piggy banks are tasting the business ends of hammers across the city. It's Christmas shopping season, officially, finally.

I know what you're saying. Christmas is a spiritual time of year; there's no need for presents. Fine. You explain that to your 7-year-old nephew who'll send himself flailing down the stairs if he doesn't get his Purple MegaloRanger with Power Pout Action. Christmas isn't all about presents, but they do make it more interesting. Accept it. (It's finally the season. I'll capitulate now.)

You're probably going to have to go home, listen to Mannheim Steamroller Christmas songs for hours upon end, be subjected to TV shows like "Shania Twain Got Stuck in the Chimney," "Rammstein und das tote Ren," and "A Menendez Family Christmas." You'll need presents to distract everyone from the fact that you'd rather be locked in the trunk of your car than in the living room.

If you're going to run the fiscal gauntlet and actually buy presents for someone, you need to look at several criteria. Here they are, in no particular order:

■ Merit. You will not buy your father the same gift you will buy the Parking Services employee you see every day. Some people just get more, based on the nature of their relationship with you and, to be blunt, what they deserve. You'll buy a different present for Martin Gramatica than you will that kicker for Colorado (you remember, just a little bit to the right with no time left?). Not that I'm bitter. Martin gets a nice, fluffy hat. Colorado kicker-guy gets coal. A lot of it. Preferably in a Texas-sized chunk, falling from the sky.

■ Safety. Maybe the only thing your 7-year-old nephew wants is a nail gun. Fine. Sooner or later he'll have to cope with severe, painful disappointment in his life, and Christmas is as good a time as any. Do not buy him the nail gun. If you happen to survive the encounter, more than likely you'll not survive his parents. If nothing else, they probably can shoot straighter. Buy the kid a Teletubby and let the parents worry about any psychological catastrophes.

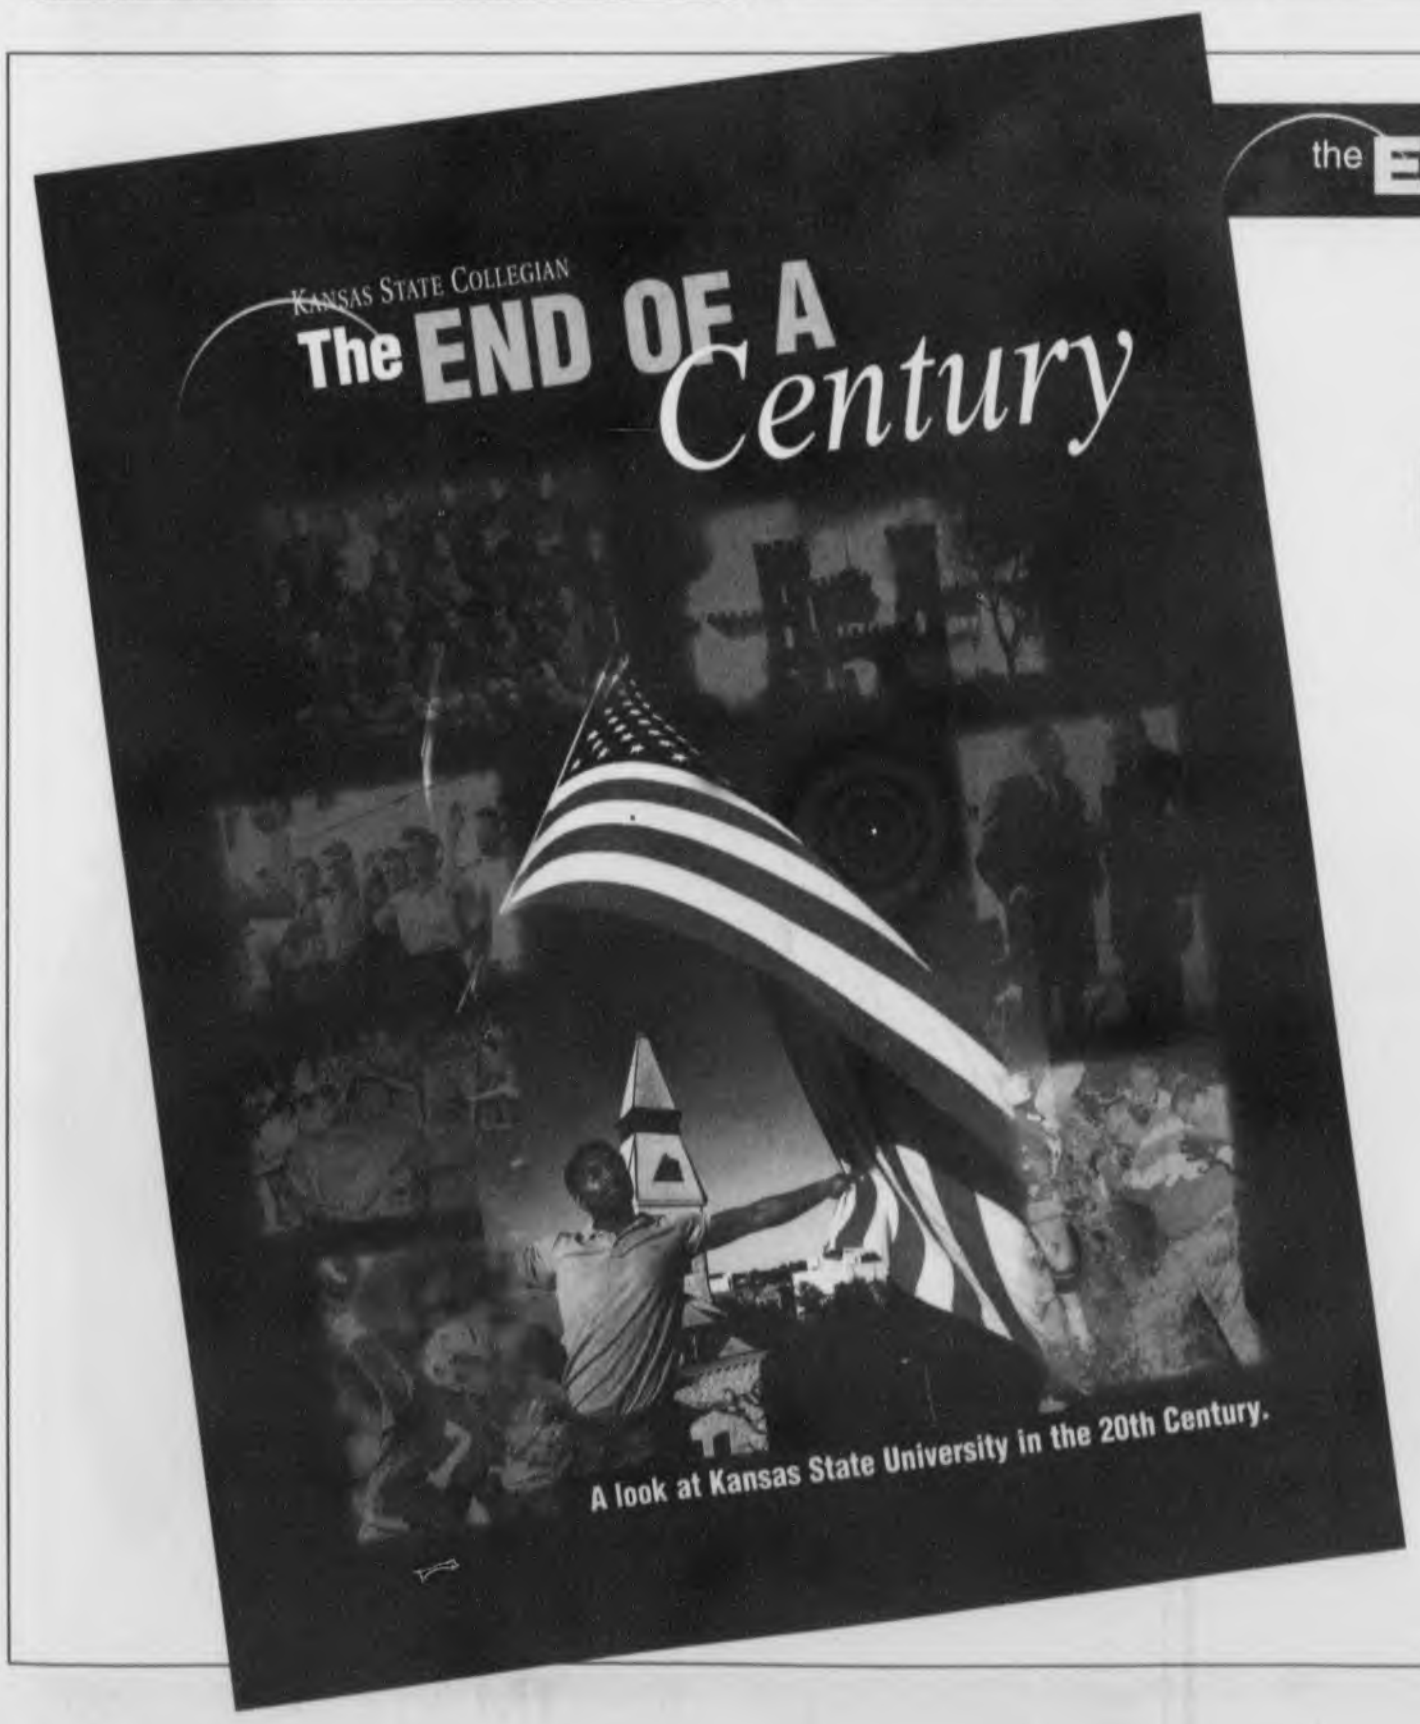
■ Suitability. Some things just don't make good Christmas presents. Grave plots, staplers and carpets are best saved for a non-holiday season. As a general rule, don't give edible gifts. (Exceptions follow.) Don't stick a potato in someone's stocking, at least, not during Christmas season. Fruitcakes are best launched at neighboring houses as artillery.

■ Need. Don't buy a car freshener for the poor soul whose car caught on fire around Fort Riley. Don't buy earrings for someone who's not pierced yet (and don't pierce them without permission). Buy 'em what they need. If they're college students, buy them food. If they're grad students, buy 'em huge bottles of stimulants with coffee chasers. If they're GTAs, add some hemlock to that, just in case.

■ Want. A very simple solution to a sometimes insurmountable problem of "What do you get the guy/girl who has everything?" is just to ask 'em a damn question. Say it with me: "What do you want?" (Say it in that serpentine hiss you reserve for when your roommate interrupts your social life at 2 a.m. by knocking on the door and telling you that there's a really cool show on Animal Planet.) Never, ever assume what they want. You will be wrong. Just because you've got a closeted desire to hear Lithuanian yodeling choirs doesn't mean your sister will be able to fake a smile on Dec. 25 ("Oh. It's just what I wanted. I can get $3 for this downtown, right?").

■ You. Only part of the gift is the recipient. Some will take creative approaches in giving this season. I don't mean they'll fold paper, hack it to death with scissors, and give everyone "snowflakes" that look like they were hit by shotguns at close range. I mean a genuine expression of yourself, through (sigh) whatever medium you choose to express yourself. If you want to give an interpretive dance for Christmas, hey, go wild. Good luck wrapping it. Maybe you're majoring in pottery (it's possible) or something equally practical. Nothing is as pure an expression of yourself as something you craft.

If at any point you start to lose sight of Christmas amid the bills and receipts and capitalistic chaos, then put it all aside and forget it. Gift-giving is an enhancement to the season, not vice-versa. It can be overwhelming, but don't stress. It's gross materialism, it's just not the end of the world.



No, that comes a week later.

Children line up to purchase Pokémon merchandise in New York City on Nov. 12. Pokémon merchandise is anticipated to be the items most in demand this holiday season.

Pokémon merchandise expected to be in demand among children during upcoming holiday season

BY SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Danny Murrow, seventh-grader at Dwight D. Eisenhower Middle School, has known for some time what he wants for Christmas. Like many children his age, this holiday season's newest gift craze is at the top of his wish list.

Pokémon, Japanese for "pocket monster," is stealing the hearts and checkbooks of countless consumers.

"It's an unexplainable phenomenon," said Tracy Chadwick, assistant manager of KayBee Toys and senior in accounting.

Pokémon, which originated in Japan, now has spread to the United States and has taken form in trading cards, bean bag toys, key chains, action figures and board games. A new movie also was released last month, Chadwick said.

"Basically, anything Pokémon is big," he said. "The cards are the biggest item."

The Pokémon game consists of 151 cards, all with different characters printed on them. The object of the game is to earn cards after fighting and defeating the other characters, Chadwick said.

Like many children, Murrow said he has collected almost all the cards available.

To keep fans entertained, there will be a new wave of cards coming out soon, Chadwick said.

"We'll have them the day after Thanksgiving," he said. "We open at 6. First come, first served. I don't know how long it will last after that."

All ages are interested in Pokémon collectibles, Chadwick said.

"Basically, anyone from 4 to 50 gets into this," he said. "Older people are buying them, too, because of the collectibility issue."

The rarest card is worth $70 in secondary markets, Chadwick said.

Chadwick said the increased popularity and higher prices are due in part to the influence of television.

"Part of it comes from the media. So much of the media talks about it," he said. "Then kids start liking it, then other kids start liking it because their friends like it."

Some educators feel the craze has begun to spin out of control, said Becky Switzer, coordinator of K-State's kindergarten day-care program.

"It's getting really competitive," she said. "It makes a lot of kids feel badly because they don't have as many cards as the others. It's gotten to the point where we have to restrict the kids from bringing them to school."

Switzer said it is unusual for a craze to affect younger kids to the extent that Pokémon has.

"I'm a little concerned by it," she said. "Younger kids are becoming obsessive with it. This is the first time I've ever seen anything like this."

It is important for parents to remind their children it is just a game, Switzer said.

"I think parents are promoting this," she said. "They must be putting a lot of importance on this, and they need to teach their children it's just for fun."

For Christmas, Murrow said he is asking for the Pokémon Gameboy game and more trading cards.

"I don't know why I like it. It's just cool," he said. "It's just really cool."

Local toy program provides gifts for children whose families cannot afford to buy presents

BY SARA MARTIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Last Christmas, hundreds of children might have woke up to find little or nothing under their trees.

But Toys for Manhattan, an annual used-toy run, came to the rescue, as it has for nearly 40 years. This year the group, which is sponsored by the All Bikers Aimed Towards Education group of Kansas, has teamed up with Toys for Tots to help even more children of families in need wake up with smiles on their faces.

"It gives them an opportunity to use our name, which everybody knows," said Lee Jones, campaign coordinator for the second-annual Riley County Toys for Tots.

WANT TO HELP OUT?
Anyone interested in helping sort toys at the distribution point can go to 705 N. 11th St. at 10:30 each morning after Saturday.

The national program is sponsored by the Marine Corps League to help people collect toys to distribute in their communities.

"It's a respectable, credible organization. It kind of helped us out with the experience they have and helps them to continue using the Toys for Tots name," Jones, referring to ABATE, said.

To kick off the toy run Saturday, the ABATE group will spend the morning collecting new and used unwrapped toys from drop boxes at businesses around town and bring them to the Manhattan Town Center food court parking lot.

Bikers from across the Midwest will arrive there between 10:30 and 11:30 a.m. to organize the toys and prepare for a parade at 12:30 p.m. down Poyntz Avenue to 705 N. 11th St., the distribution point for the toys. Santa will be riding in the parade, and children are welcome to come to the mall before the parade to see the motorcycles and donate toys. Richard Harrison, who organizes the ABATE run, said many of the bikers will let children sit on their motorcycles for pictures.

All of the toys collected before Dec. 4 will be taken to Al Myers, a retired police officer responsible for starting the Manhattan Toy Run. He operates the distribution point, which essentially becomes a toy store for any family with need. The store opens at 9 a.m. on Dec. 4, 11 and 18, and remains open until all of the toys are gone.

"We don't turn away anyone," Myers said. "You take what you want, but not more than you need. That's our motto."

Myers said he began collecting toys 38 years ago when, as a police officer, he was called to a home on Christmas Eve. When he arrived, he found 11 children inside with a homemade mantle and seven or eight cigarette package-size boxes for gifts.

"There was nothing wrong with the seven or eight packages, but for 11 children...," Myers said.

After the call, he went back to the station and asked fellow employees to go home and bring back some used toys to take to the family. The next morning, a group of police officers went back to the home and brought the children bags of toys.

"I don't think I could ever explain to you the joy these kids had in their hearts, in their eyes and their minds," Myers said. "That's what started it for me."

The next year, Myers began organizing an official toy run so community members could donate good used toys instead of having to buy new ones for the cause. It took several years to get the kinks ironed out, but Myers organized the program so instead of delivering toys, parents could come to his home and pick out exactly what they thought best fit their children.

"My wife said she went back to Al's distribution point last year and saw families lined up before he even opened, lined up 30 or 40 deep ... and the look on their faces — it's amazing," Harrison said.

Usually, there are plenty of toys for all ages, Harrison said, but there is always a need for gifts fit for 11- to 15-year-old girls.

After Dec. 4, any new toys donated in drop boxes go to the local Toys for Tots, which distributes new toys through local organizations, and the used toys will continue to be sent to Myers.

"We do not distribute toys. That's why we use the agencies. They know who needs it better than we do," Jones said. "Everything they collect as a result of their efforts from the toy run goes to Al."

Anyone interested in helping sort through toys at the distribution point can come to 705 N. 11th St. around 10:30 each morning after Saturday. Myers said people are usually there for an hour going through new donations. Anyone who wants to help with the Toys for Tots can call Lee Jones at (785) 485-2644.

After the parade, Harrison said members of ABATE will go to bars in Aggieville in a poker run. It will cost $5 a hand to play, and the winner will receive $25. All proceeds will be taken to Myers at 3 p.m. After that, ABATE sponsors the Slim and Jim's Road Kill Chili Feed at the Cock and Bull Tavern. Chili will be sold on a donation basis, followed by a charity auction, which includes leather jackets and a new electric Jeep donated by Briggs Automotive. The money collected from this will be donated to the Muscular Dystrophy Association.

Christmas tree

Manhattan offers alternatives for residents in search of fresh trees this holiday season

By TRACY DOILE
Kansas State Collegian

Artificial Christmas trees don't compare to the look and smell of a fresh pine.

Gallaher Christmas Trees, owned by Lindy and Beth Gallaher, has been in the business of supplying this aromatic decoration since 1982.

"People come from all over because we've been in business so long," Lindy Gallaher said. He said hundreds of people from surrounding towns, like Wamego and Clay Center, Kan., come to select a tree every year. He said people from as far away as the Kansas City area also have come.

The Gallahers grow as many as 10,000 trees on 10 acres of their Christmas tree farm. Lindy Gallaher said they grow scotch pine, white pine and Austrian pine, as well as Fraser firs from Wisconsin.

"They're the best Christmas tree there is," he said.

Prices for the pine trees are $27.95 plus tax for trees less than 7 feet tall and $33.95 plus tax for trees more than 7 feet.

The Fraser firs range from $42 to $80.

Lindy Gallaher said the farm is located about five minutes outside of Manhattan on Anderson Avenue.

He said it's about 3 1/2 miles past Scenic Drive, west of town.

He said there are other places that sell trees, like tree lots at grocery stores, but the Christmas tree farm has a more novel atmosphere.

"It's a lot more fun to walk around," he said. "The unique feature is the fun, family-outing kind of a family adventure."

Mike Molt, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said he remembers visiting a Christmas tree farm to find a tree when he was a child.

"It was a tradition of friends of the family, and we thought it sounded like fun," he said. "I was just a little guy, probably 6 or 7. It was a long time ago. I just remember riding on a tractor and cutting down a tree. I think my dad actually ended up cutting down most of it."

Molt said he doubts he'll need a tree from a tree farm here in Manhattan.

"It's kind of tough, living in an apartment. We'll probably have a fake one," he said. "Maybe when I have some little kids running around, I'll visit a tree farm again."

Chet Nelsen, a Manhattan Breakfast Optimist Club volunteer, carries a Christmas tree Sunday for a customer at the Optimist Club Christmas Tree Lot in Longs Park at 17th and Yuma streets. The Optimist Club supports many youth organizations in the community, and the Christmas tree sale is its primary fund-raiser.

COLLEGIAN STAFF PHOTO

Selecting a tree at Gallaher Christmas Trees is much like Molt described.

"We do all the work," Lindy Gallaher said. "Basically, you just have to pick it out."

Lindy Gallaher said he offers same-day delivery of a tree for students who might not have any means of transporting a tree home.

Besides Christmas trees, the Gallahers sell homemade wreaths.

The wreath prices average between $18 and $24. Beth Gallaher custom-makes the wreaths.

The Gallahers offer shipping of the wreaths, so students could pay for one and have it sent home to their families.

Gallaher Christmas Trees officially opened Friday. Business hours begin weekdays at 3:30 p.m., Saturdays at 10 a.m., and Sundays at noon. The farm closes daily at sunset.

Holiday shopping season begins with healthy sales gains for retailers

By RACHEL BECK
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Larry Lynn is the ultimate shopper: This holiday season, he has employed both the Internet's worldwide range and good old fashioned shoe leather to snap up bargains.

"I got all the information (online) so I can go in and — boom! I know the pricing, I know about the product," said Lynn, who was shopping at the Gwinnett Place Mall outside Atlanta.

Lynn wasn't the only savvy customer using a little bit of high and low technology as the holiday shopping season kicked off over Thanksgiving weekend.

Not only did many consumers use the Web to buy, they also relied on it to help them craft their gift lists. Many shoppers were spotted carrying printouts from the Internet as they walked through the mall.

Retailers were optimistic about this holiday season, their expectations lifted by high levels of consumer confidence, low unemployment rates and sharp gains on Wall Street.

They were counting on shoppers like L.T. Owen, a 61-year-old accountant living outside of Atlanta, who said he thinks the economy looks "rosy." And Chicago resident Thomas Avant, who said he feels he can spend more because he is making more at his current job.

"I'm spending more because we did well in the stock market," said Kay Abrams, who was shopping on Chicago's State Street.

"So far, the holiday season has shaped up for many retailers brilliantly," said Kurt Barnard, president of the consulting firm Barnard's Retail Trend Report. "In many cases, this weekend was well beyond their forecasts."

But many merchants still are going to great lengths to lure shoppers and get them buying early in the season, rather than waiting until the days right before and after Christmas, when stores typically slash prices to clear out inventories.

Online stores, in particular, are hoping for most purchases to come in the next two weeks, which would give them ample time to deliver goods as well as reorder out-of-stock merchandise.

To drive people to their stores and inspire them to spend, online and traditional retailers are using deep discounts — some offering as much as 50 percent off — and aggressive advertising, blanketing television, the Internet and newspapers with promotions.

"If you want bargains, you know you have to spend a little bit more time in line."

— Patty Tappen, California shopper

The tactics apparently worked this weekend. TeleCheck Services Inc., a check approval service, said the amount of sales paid for by check on Friday rose by an unexpectedly strong 6.4 percent from the same day a year ago.

While Friday undoubtedly was the busiest day, retailers reported sales continued at a steady pace through Sunday.

Crowds packed stores such as Wal-Mart, Target and Best Buy, with shoppers grabbing up everything from $5 Barbie dolls to $99 televisions. Checkout lines at some stores ran 20 people deep.

"If you want the bargains, you know you have to spend a little bit more time in line," said Patty Tappen, who was shopping at the Inland Center Mall in San Bernardino, Calif. "It's worth the hassle."

Sales also were brisk online. Amazon.com reported orders this weekend were up 150 percent from a year ago. Yahoo! had its biggest day ever on Friday, as did rival Lycos, and sales remained strong through the weekend. Both portals have hundreds of merchants selling goods through their Web sites.

According to the Nielsen/NetRatings Holiday E-Commerce Index, there was an 18 percent growth in online traffic from Wednesday through the weekend. The winners included those selling toys, with an 80 percent surge in visitors to those sites, and electronics, which saw a 40 percent gain.

Demand was so overwhelming at some Internet stores, such as Toysrus.com and KBKids.com, that their Web sites were inaccessible sporadically throughout the weekend.

Despite the strong start to the season, retailers remained cautious Sunday, because in recent years the Thanksgiving weekend has accounted for less than 10 percent of all sales tallied during the Christmas season.

In addition, merchants know any stock market volatility or unusual weather in the coming weeks could keep shoppers home.

Meat products provide alternative gift option

BY LESLIE ELSASSER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Purchasing meat in Weber Hall's meat lab is an alternative to shopping at a grocery store this holiday season.

On Wednesdays from 3 to 6 p.m. and on Fridays from noon to 6 p.m., the meat lab is open in Weber 166. Beef, ham, pork, turkey, sausage and lamb are available to purchase. Prices range from $1 a pound for sausage to $10 a pound for tenderloin, John Wolf, meat lab manager, said.

Trendtn Jarboe, senior in animal sciences and industry, said sales at the meat lab increase during the holidays. He said the meat lab sold about 400 turkeys and 50 chickens for Thanksgiving. The meat lab doesn't have any special prices on the meat during the holiday season, but prices on different selections might be marked down, Jarboe said.

"The prices are pretty competitive," he said. "Some things are more expensive, and some things are less. You can get a pretty good price on the bacon."

A bonus to buying meat at the meat lab is the freshness of the product, Matt Mead, junior in kinesiology, said. For example, he said bacon sold at a grocery store might be two weeks old, but the meat lab's bacon would be freshly cut.

MORE INFO? Anyone interested in purchasing meat can go to Weber 166 or call 532-1279 to place an order.

In the past, the meat lab provided the hamburger to sell at football games at KSU Stadium, and this season the lab provided the turkey legs.

"We were here late on Friday nights," Mead said. "We were trucking stuff over there at 1 in the morning when they were still welding on the stadium."

Planning, attention to detail important to maintaining health during holiday meals

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Finals are not the only thing on students' minds with the semester drawing to a close. Holidays are just around the corner with family, presents and lots of food.

It is important to plan ahead and pay attention to how holiday food is handled and prepared, Karen Penner, professor of food science, said.

"We tend to cook larger amounts of food at this time of year," Penner said. "It is important to plan ahead and allow enough preparation time to prepare adequately for the meal."

Penner said another thing to remember is to use a meat thermometer when checking the meat. She said most people are used to eyeballing the meat, but she said that is not as accurate as using a thermometer.

"First of all, the meat needs to be cooked at the right temperature," Penner said. "Temperature control is important throughout the meal, from the thawing to the leftovers, because that is when bacteria can grow."

Cross-contamination is another thing Penner said people need to be careful of when cooking large meals. She said personal hygiene is essential when working with raw meats and raw vegetables and fruits at the same time.

"People have to be careful when cutting and handling meat and then using the same utensils for another dish," Penner said. "In order to avoid contamination of other raw foods, people must wash the utensils and their hands with hot water and soap before working on something else.

"It is also very important to wash your hands before working in the kitchen after handling raw foods, taking out the trash, going to the bathroom or anything that would potentially contaminate other foods."

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center, said the primary consequence of not handling food properly is acquiring a food-borne illness.

"The first consequence of not paying proper attention to food preparation is of course food poisoning," Kennedy said. "It may not be known immediately unless there is a poor taste, but in a few hours, the symptoms will appear."

Kennedy said gastritis, an inflammation in the lining of the stomach, is one form of food poisoning, although it has many other causes, such as ulcers and excessive alcohol consumption. She said in many cases of food-related gastritis, there is a delayed onset.

"If it is bacteria-related, it can take a while for the bacteria to grow and multiply, so symptoms may not occur for more than eight hours," Kennedy said. "It depends on how much and how quickly the bacteria grow in numbers."

Kennedy said symptoms leading to food poisoning can include vomiting, diarrhea, abdominal cramps and perspiration. She said medical attention should be sought after 24 hours of vomiting and dehydration.

"A person with food poisoning cannot keep anything down," Kennedy said. "This can lead to dehydration, muscle fatigue and extreme exhaustion. If it is bad enough, fluids will have to be administered at the hospital, and in some cases, an antibiotic will be given."

Penner said people need to care for leftovers properly. She said food in some families will be left on the counter throughout the day and not refrigerated properly.

"It is very important that when the meal is done, the leftovers are refrigerated," Penner said. "Meat can be cut into smaller chunks to cool more quickly and fit into the refrigerator, but don't leave it on the kitchen counter all day. When the main serving is done, refrigerate what is left."

Penner said because most refrigerators are not big enough to handle the excess of food during the holidays, smaller storage units are good to use. She also said that if the temperature outside is 40 degrees or lower, a back porch can be used for temporary food storage.

"It has been so warm outside lately that the temperature might not cooperate enough to leave food outside," Penner said. "However, if it is cool enough, make sure the food is well-covered and placed above the ground so animals do not get into it."

Traveling long distances for the holiday meal is also a common occurrence. Penner said those who will be traveling should volunteer to bring the rolls, beverages or fruit pie rather than items that need to stay hot. She said it is harder to transport hot foods than something that can stay in a cooler.

"There is something everyone can contribute to the holiday meal," Penner said. "However, it is better for those that have to travel to do something that is more shelf-stable than something that needs to stay hot for two to three hours."

Demand overwhelms Toys R Us site

By RACHEL BECK
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Toysrus.com was betting big on this Christmas. The Internet division of the giant toy retailer had spent the last few months shaking off old ghosts and seemed in great shape heading into November.

But Toysrus.com may be a victim of its own success.

Its Web site has been overwhelmed by the number of people trying to get onto it.

That's forced the online toy store to put a limit on how many people can visit the site at a given time to prevent it from crashing.

Some shoppers can't get in — despite their repeated tries. In the competitive world of online retailing, analysts warn that Toyrus.com could be driving customers away for good and sending sales to its rivals.

"Consumers want to shop at a place that is reliable, and Toysrus.com doesn't have much time left to prove they are reliable," said Mike May, an analyst at the Internet research firm Jupiter Communications.

The company's latest crisis is the first real setback for the new chief executive, John Barbour. A toy industry veteran, he showed up three months ago to take over the struggling online store.

When he arrived, things were nothing short of gloomy. The Web site was slow and uninviting. The company had just lost its financial backing from a hot venture capital firm. Its chief executive suddenly had quit after just a few months on the job.

So the overhaul began. Barbour and his team toiled away to improve Toysrus.com.

They redesigned the site — making it easier to navigate and more pleasant to look at with brighter colors and flashier graphics. They expanded the product offerings, including some exclusive goods that shoppers couldn't find anywhere else.

They added staff to the customer service center and upgraded the site's servers, which were intended to ensure that the site would remain up-and-running.

Toysrus.com signed some key marketing deals, aligning with online giants like America Online and Yahoo!. They also expanded their advertising, including some radio spots that targeted parents in the morning when they drive their kids to school or go to work.

The subsidiary also began promoting its Web site's link to the Toys R Us stores, reminding shoppers that they could buy online and return to the physical stores — something most of their online competitors can't do.

They also began to use the stores to drive shoppers to the Web. A promotion at 20 stores offering $10 off any purchase online generated more than 13,000 new customers in August alone.

And it all worked. Toysrus.com saw a huge increase in the number of people visiting the site.

From June to October, traffic was up 270 percent, and even with last week's troubles, there was a 10-fold increase in traffic.

One happy customer is Robert Sponaugle of Atco, N.J. While he bought two defective Furby dolls from the Web site (which wasn't Toysrus.com's fault), Toysrus.com eventually got him a working doll and also sent him a $50 gift certificate for his troubles.

"They paid attention to me and remedied the situation, and they threw in something extra, which they didn't need to do," he said.

Now, the company is racing to add more server power so that its Web site runs consistently. It also is scaling back some its advertising to slow traffic to the site.

"It is a mixed emotion in that ... our business is way beyond anything we would have planned for, but the negative is there are customers who are finding it difficult to get onto the site," Barbour said.

Still, analysts warn that consumers won't tolerate being shut out again — especially in the week of Thanksgiving or the last week of November when demand to get into the site will likely be at its highest for the year.

"I think Toysrus.com is well on its way to being a great site, and still can be a major player this Christmas," said Seema Williams, an analyst at the Internet consulting firm Forrester Research. "But they need to iron out all of these problems before they can be anything."

It's been a bumpy road for Toysrus.com since the company first started selling toys online in June 1998 on a site that was dull and slow.

At the same time, online rival eToys was building itself up fast and gaining momentum. After only a year in business, it was the market leader by Christmas 1998, wooing shoppers with its appealing site and wider array of merchandise.

Sales at eToys topped $30 million in 1998, more than three times that at Toysrus.com, according to analysts.

Last April, Toys R Us announced an aggressive overhaul of its Internet division.

Besides improving the way the site looked, the company also planned to add new features, such as e-mail reminders to let shoppers know when an item was back in stock.

Toy industry veteran Robert Moog was tapped to be the CEO and Benchmark Capital of Menlo Park, Calif., the Silicon Valley venture capital firm that helped bankroll such Internet successes as the online auction house eBay, was to partner with Toys R Us in the new venture.

Eventually, Toys R Us planned to sell stock in Toysrus.com to the public.

By summer, however, the grand plans for Toysrus.com began to crumble — just months away from the start of the all-important holiday season. Moog quit for undisclosed reasons and the partnership with Benchmark was called off. The public stock offering never happened.

A distribution center was built and the site redesigned, but it still lacked the content and ease of many of its rivals.

While Toysrus.com limped along, more competition came into the marketplace, including Internet superstore Amazon.com, which launched a toy store on its well-known Web site in July. And eToys continued to grow, expanding into all types of children's products — from books to software.

In August, Barbour was brought in to turn Toysrus.com around. He had been a divisional executive at Hasbro, with successful and fast-growing brands like OddzOn (think Koosh balls), Cap Candy and Sound Bites under his belt.

Wall Street applauded the appointment, believing that Barbour had the marketing savvy and leadership ability to revive the struggling Internet unit.

Call Hall offers gift alternatives

■ Dairy products, meat among items available for sale this Christmas.

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Christmas shoppers having a hard time picking out a gift for that special someone might want to look into giving the gift of food.

The Dairy Bar in Call Hall once again is offering a Christmas catalog of meat and cheese boxes. The meats and cheeses, all produced and licensed by K-State, range from $16 to $38. Prospective buyers can choose from various cheeses, summer sausage and Wildcat loaf — a spicier version of summer sausage. T-shirts, mugs, hams and turkeys also are offered, Renee Westgate, Dairy Bar manager, said.

All dairy items sold by the Dairy Bar, including milk, ice cream, cheese and butter, are made by a full-time civil service staff in the dairy processing plant in Call Hall. Graduate and undergraduate students also conduct research projects in the plant.

Catalogs are available, and shoppers have until Dec. 22 to place their orders. Orders can be picked up at the Dairy Bar until Dec. 24. The catalogs can be picked up at the Dairy Bar in Call Hall or sent to a person's home, Westgate said.

Westgate said she expects the gift boxes to be a popular item, judging from the high demand received in the past.

"I think we did almost a thousand boxes last year," Westgate said.

For those who are more fond of the ice cream sold at Call Hall, the Dairy Bar has added a new flavor for the holidays. A half-gallon of peppermint ice cream, always a big seller during Christmas, will be available for $2.40, Westgate said.

The Dairy Bar is open from 9:30 a.m. to 5:15 p.m. Monday through Thursday and until 6 on Friday. All profit goes back to the dairy-processing department and is used for teaching, research, maintenance and facility upgrades, Westgate said.

People can call the Dairy Bar at 532-1292 and have a brochure mailed to them.

"ONE OF THE THINGS THAT HAS BEEN POPULAR IN THE PAST FEW YEARS IS THE CASCADING LIGHTS OR THE LIGHTS THAT STRING THROUGH BUSHES."

ATWILL O'NEAL, AREA SALES MANAGER FOR THE MANHATTAN DILLARD'S DEPARTMENT STORE

Lost in lights

Local businesses feature variety of holiday decorations

BY JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Christmas trees, holiday wreaths and mistletoe all symbolize the essence of the holidays. When boxes containing Christmas decor are recalled from their storage spaces, the feeling of Christmas comes alive again.

Decorating for the holidays is a tradition for many families, and it shows within their heartfelt decorations. Despite how certain trends have developed over the years, the traditional holiday decorating techniques are holding strong. The red and green colors of Christmas are the main ingredient in holiday decorating, but they are taking some interesting twists and turns with different styles and themes.

Atwill O'Neal, area sales manager for the Manhattan Dillard's department store, said the main sellers around holiday times are thematic trees and decorations.

"We come out with different themes every year," O'Neal said. "We have several themes to choose from, like a heritage theme and an Americana theme."

O'Neal said the Dillard's chain comes up with different themes every year that prove to be popular for years.

"Many of the iridescent decorations have been in style for many years," O'Neal said. "We have a tree called the glitz tree that is done in iridescent bulbs and ornaments."

The classic tales of Rudolph and Santa Claus also have been incorporated into decorations for decades, and this year J.C. Penney Co. Inc. stores are following a theme that brings out the child in everyone.

"We developed a line of Rudolph merchandise for this holiday season," said Cindy Kalivoda, visual manager of the Manhattan JCPenney store. "We have decorated the store in a Rudolph theme, as well as developed a line of Rudolph merchandise to sell over the holidays."

Kalivoda said during the holidays, JCPenney sells thematic merchandise developed by the store chain.

"Each year we follow what the company comes out with, but we decorate each department in the store with different decorations," she said.

Even though department store chains have themes they follow every year, they always have the traditional decor of Christmas trees and wreaths draped in red and green.

"We always try to have the traditional colors and trends," Kalivoda said. "Pine trees decorated in red and green is always the trend during the holidays."

O'Neal said even though the trends might change, having a well-lit home for the holidays is always something that will be in style. She said lights inside and outside the house are one of the most essential things for the holidays.

"The traditional colors are always there, just in different forms," O'Neal said. "One of the things that has been popular in the past few years is the cascading lights or the lights that string through bushes."

Ben Thornley, sales associate with the Manhattan Sears Roebuck and Co. store, said the cascading lights have been popular sellers for Sears as well.

"The lights that look like icicles are popular and have been for several seasons now," Thornley said.

Thornley also said a new trend in Christmas trees is trees that have lights already on them.

"I think that people like the idea of not having to fuss with putting lights on the tree," he said. "Those have been very popular."

O'Neal said Christmas merchandise changes from year to year, but it always has the general themes of Christmas in mind.

"Trends change, but the themes that are designed each year always have a traditional holiday touch," she said.

Law enforcement set to stop holiday crime

■ RCPD, security at mall prepare for traditional rise of holiday shoplifting, theft.

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Help from local police and security can allow community members to shop for the holidays with little worry about shoplifting or theft affecting their holiday cheer.

Mike Gee, security director for Manhattan Town Center, said shoplifting and theft tend to increase during the holiday season, but that he is prepared.

"There's always an increase during this time of year," he said. "Shoplifting in the stores is where we see an influx in crime. We have a very minimal problems with burglary, but there are some instances of indoor theft."

Because of the rise in shoplifting during the holiday season, Gee said he makes sure to prepare not only the store owners of the mall, but his own officers as well.

"We increase our manpower this time of year, and we have a shoplifting seminar for our merchants every year. We want them to have appropriate staff on hand and to know their customers," Gee said.

The Riley County Police Department also does its part to help out, too, Sgt. Joshua Kyle said.

"We always try to get extra patrol in the shopping areas," Kyle said. "The mall, of course, has their own security, but we try to keep a man on foot over there, as well."

Gee said that with both the mall security and the RCPD available to patrol the area, most would-be shoplifters usually don't take action.

"We stay very alert to our surroundings and make our presence known so as to deter any type of theft," Gee said.

These crimes, however, aren't limited to the inside of the shopping malls, said Lt. Herb Crosby of the RCPD Investigation Department.

"Vehicle burglaries tend to happen quite a bit, and this may be due to people not putting their purchases into the trunks of their cars, or in a concealed place," Crosby said.

Sgt. Lynette Woods of the RCPD Records Division said these thefts usually aren't particularly serious.

"They're usually all minor misdemeanors, and the things that are taken are not of much monetary value, usually less than $500," she said.

Gee said mall security provides an escort to the patron's car if requested.

Patrons shouldn't need to rely completely on police and security, though, Sheila Howard, senior in criminology, said. She said she feels safe when shopping.

"The economy is so good now that there's less shoplifting and crime," Howard said. "You still need to keep your purchases in your trunk, and keep your wallet in your pocket or somewhere on your person."

Mall merchants usually are the first to detect the shoplifters in their stores, and they then call upon the mall security or police to handle the rest of the situation, said Seth Olson, manager of Musicland in Town Center.

One way merchants are doing so is keeping extra employees around during the holiday season.

"A lot of the businesses around do hire extra staff for these situations," Gee said.

Even with extra employees, Olson said, one has to be prepared for the possibility that they might have to handle the situation themselves.

"You have to be ready to take good shoplifting measures. You have to know what's going on and how to handle the situation," Olson said. "Even so, the mall security is great year round. They're really doing their part."

Shelter resident expects to be homeless for holidays

■ Man left stranded in city due to car problems intends to stay in Manhattan area.

BY BRYAN SCRIBNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Bob Corbett's car broke down three weeks ago while traveling through Kansas, he was left stranded in an unfamiliar area with no transportation and no roof over his head.

Since Corbett had no family to spend the holiday season with and was miles away from his home in California, he was forced to turn to the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

"They make sure we have plenty of food, shelter and bedding," Corbett said. "All we have to do is a few menial chores. It's a cake walk."

Corbett said the people at the shelter have been fair and friendly.

"There are just a few rules you have to abide by," Corbett said. "They treat me like a family member."

After 15 years of service, Junell Norris, executive director of the shelter, said there has been an increase in families that have relied on the shelter. The total amount of shelter residents has risen 400 percent since welfare reform in 1996.

Norris said about 400 people are housed each year, and that at any one time, 26 people can occupy the five bedrooms of living space.

> "They make sure we have plenty of food, shelter and bedding. All we have to do is a few menial chores. It's a cake walk."
> — Bob Corbett, shelter resident

Norris said transients are allowed to stay in the shelter for two days and Manhattan residents for a minimum of two weeks.

Out of the many programs designed to provide an opportunity for individuals to maintain their self-sufficiency, Norris said the Sunflower Transitional Living Program works best at bridging the gap between the shelter and independence. She said the program has a 95-percent success rate.

Corbett, who will be moving into transitional housing, said the people at the shelter work to help occupants get back on their feet. Corbett's stay was extended an extra week while he found a job.

Although his job in California provided better pay, Corbett said he might stay in Manhattan.

"Everyone's so friendly here, I don't know if I'm ready to take off," Corbett said. "This place is starting to grow on me. If it was that bad, no one would stay here."

Corbett said that especially through the holidays, the community has treated him and others at the shelter well. For Thanksgiving, he was invited to dinner by one of his co-workers.

Through Christmas, Norris said some of the strict house rules are lightened.

The shelter extends curfews and tries to provide a warm and positive atmosphere for those left homeless during the season.

In order to provide occupants with things they need, Norris said an adopt-an-ornament Christmas tree is available for community members to pick from.

"We make sure everyone has been adopted twice," Norris said. "It's a way to ensure everyone gets a Christmas gift."

Shining decorations attract sightseers all across country

BY DAVID FOSTER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Chuck Smith knows it is better to light one candle than to curse the darkness. And if one is good, why stop there?

"At Christmas time, I tell people to look for the glow on the horizon, and that will be my house," he says.

Each December, Smith's yard in Franklin, Tenn., keeps the night at bay with 120,000 miniature lights, 250 strobes and five miles of electrical wire. A 200 MHz Pentium computer runs a 14-minute light show, including a tree that slowly changes from red to green to white.

Smith calls it his Christmas light obsession, and he is not the first to succumb.

Ever since some cave dweller added logs to a fire already blazing, inhabitants of northern lands have battled the shadows of December. Candles have brightened solstice festivals from Hanukkah to Kwanzaa. Ancient Persians built fires to praise Mithra, god of light. When pagan bonfires met the star of Bethlehem, the Yule log was born.

Color these old yearnings with the hues of high-tech Hollywood, and the result is Pebble Creek Drive in Rocklin, Calif. There, dozens of families collaborate on a luminary extravaganza with a Disney theme: moving Mickeys, talking Santas and choo-choos puffing smoke.

Pilgrims come by the thousands. They ride by in rented limos and in vans from nursing homes.

At Rusty Nelson's house, they ask for details, like how he makes Santa talk, but he won't tell.

"That way, they leave with wonderment in their eyes," he said. "It's still magic."

While dazzled strangers jam the street, neighbors gather in Nelson's driveway. That's where the fire pit is. They chat and warm their hands, and when conversation fades, they stare into the glowing coals, quiet captives of the light.

Time, planning can ease season's spending stress

What does credit really cost?

If a student were to spend $1,000 this Christmas on a credit card and make only the minimum monthly payment, this is how long it would take to pay off the balance, and how much it actually would end up costing.

Interest	Time to pay off balance	Actual cost
12 percent	8 years, 2 months	$1,540
18 percent	12 years, 4 months	$2,353
21 percent	18 years, 5 months	$3,577

Hints:

- Only use credit when you can pay the balance every month. In other words, only charge what you can afford to pay.
- Try to use credit cards for emergencies and larger purchases, since credit cards offer consumer protection.
- Don't confuse a credit card with a debit card — debit cards do not offer the same protection as credit cards.

Christmas is the season of giving.

Unfortunately, most college students probably are wondering where the money for gifts is going to come from. However, a little time and planning can ease the stress of the spending.

"We need to be really careful that we're not just buying into all these marketing images," said John Grable, assistant professor for the School of Family Studies and Human Services.

The best way to stay as disciplined as possible during the holiday season is to set up a budget, Grable said.

"I'm guessing that most students don't do a budget, even a regular monthly budget," Grable said. "It's a good idea, regardless if it's Christmas time or not."

When setting up a budget, Grable said he recommends students look at their income sources and actually track how much they're spending for three weeks.

"Once they have an idea on how much is coming in and how much they're spending, they will see if there is anyplace where there is money left over. Try to spend only what you can afford to spend," Grable said.

It's a good idea to make a list of everyone you would like to get a gift, even if you might not be able to afford to, Grable said. Then, actually put a price or something you would like to buy for them beside their name.

"If you have a list, try sticking to your list. I think you will be in a much better position than if you just go in blind," Grable said.

A lot of times, people go into a store that is having a sale and use their credit card for purchases that aren't in their budget, Grable said.

"The number one thing, for me, as I'm thinking about Christmas, is really the use of credit cards, especially for college students," Grable said.

If a student went out and spent $1,000 and the credit card had an 18 percent interest rate, it actually would take 12 years and four months to pay off that balance if they were making the minimum monthly payment, Grable said.

"But I think every college student should have a credit card," Grable said. "In today's world, just for emergencies, you almost can't live without a credit card."

A good time to think about using a credit card is when you are making a really big purchase, Grable said.

"If you pay cash or write a check for a purchase and it breaks down, the only recourse you have is to go back to the merchant. If you bought it with a credit card, you actually have consumer protection," Grable said. "If the merchant says he's not going to replace it, you can go to the credit card company and they'll negotiate it for you."

Grable said the best advice is to just stay within your budget and be creative when thinking of gift ideas.

"Students who have some artistic ability or talents in making things, obviously that's a great way to do something. You can even buy a really inexpensive picture frame and put a picture of yourself in it for your grandparents," Grable said.

Joyce Cantrell, instructor and academic advisor for the School of Family Studies and Human Services, said the gifts that have meaning and take a little time can be really inexpensive.

"A little note of appreciation takes time, takes thought and is more meaningful than a gift you went in and grabbed just to be buying a gift," Cantrell said.

Grable said Christmas is a season of giving, it's not necessarily a season of what you give, and you don't always have to give the most expensive thing. If we could get back to that we would be much better off, he said.

Non-Christians celebrate holidays with own traditions

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Ekramul Haque, adviser of the Muslim Student Association, won't take part in the Christian festivities this December. Instead, he'll celebrate the most important Muslim holiday after fasting for one month.

Haque, like some other Manhattan residents, will celebrate the holiday season with non-Christian events.

"We fast for one month based on the lunar calendar," Haque said. "From sunrise to sunset you don't eat, drink, smoke — you pray, give alms to the poor.

"It's not that you don't do these things other times of the year, but it is stressed now," he said.

Haque said he celebrates Ramadan, the Muslim holiday that involves a month of fasting and a festival, Eid-Ul-Fitr, which is the Muslim equivalent of Christmas.

The reasoning behind the fasting can be understood through the idea of self-sacrifice, he said.

"It's establishing prayer and believing in the supremacy of God," Haque said.

"The rationale behind Ramadan is much deeper," he said. "It's about controlling yourself, controlling your patience."

Fasting also allows the people to understand the plight of the underprivileged, Haque said.

"When you become hungry during the daytime, you can relate to someone who goes hungry," he said.

The dates of Ramadan are decided by the lunar calendar. There usually is a 10 to 11-day difference between each year, Haque said.

This year, Ramadan will begin Dec. 9, and end Jan. 7, Mohammad Alsaawi, graduate student in sociology, said.

The Jewish holiday, Hanukkah, also will begin Dec. 9 with the first lighting of the Menorah, an eight-pronged candle. Hanukkah lasts for eight days.

Allison Lazar, freshman in psychology, said it is tradition to light a candle each night and say a prayer. The tradition stems from the trials of the biblical character, David, she said.

"It's all about a miracle, how the candle burned for eight days when it was only supposed to burn for two," Lazar said.

For this reason, Hanukkah often is referred to as the Festival of Lights, she said.

The Jewish people participate in the gift-giving traditions, like Christians, Lazar said. Many families give a gift for each night. The traditional Jewish gift is gelt, which is chocolate money, she said.

Lazar, whose father is Jewish and mother is Christian, celebrates both Hanukkah and Christmas. She was raised Jewish, and although she said she has grown accustomed to being a minority, at times it has been difficult to deal with.

"All my life I've been in areas that are predominantly Christian. It's hard sometimes," she said. "I've gotten used to it, though, and I know what my values are. I'm something a lot of people don't know about, and I can educate them about it."

Haque said although there are not many Muslims in this area, it still is possible to maintain his own religion.

"It's not difficult at all to practice my religion," he said. You don't see as much celebration because it's a smaller group here, though."

There is one mosque in town, and it plans events during Ramadan, Alsaawi said.

"We meet every week to have dinner and breakfast together," he said. "On the last day of Ramadan, which we consider to be the most important day of the year, we celebrate and break the fast."

Haque said he is thankful he lives in a country where he can freely practice his own religion.

"The constitution of the United States recognizes that religion is a private matter," he said. "People are different. They're going to practice different religions."

Try 1 of these sure-fire holiday drink recipes

Rudolph, the Red Nose Reindeer

Ingredients:
1 1/4 ounce light rum
1 1/2 ounce lemon juice
1/2 ounce grenadine
Ice cubes
Cranberry juice
1 lemon wedge

Mixing instructions:
Mix the light rum, lemon juice and grenadine. Add the ice cubes, and fill to taste with cranberry juice. Add a wedge of lemon on your glass.

This can be done with other flavors mixed in with the cranberry, such as cranapple juice, etc.

Egg Nog

Ingredients:
6 large eggs
1 cup powdered sugar
750 milliliters dark rum, brandy or bourbon
4 cups whipping cream
1/2 cup brandy, peach or apricot
Nutmeg, freshly ground

Mixing instructions:
Separate eggs and refrigerate the whites. Beat yolks until light in color. Gradually beat in sugar, then slowly beat in one cup of rum. Let stand covered for at least one hour. Add rest of liquor, cream and brandy, beating constantly. Refrigerate, covered, for three hours. Beat egg whites until stiff, fold in. Serve sprinkled with nutmeg. Serve in a punch bowl.

Hot Mulled Cider

Ingredients:
8 cups apple cider (or juice)
1/2 cup packed brown sugar
1 ground nutmeg
1 6-inch cinnamon stick
1 teaspoon whole allspice
1 teaspoon whole cloves
8 thin orange slices
8 whole cloves

Mixing instructions:
In a large saucepan, combine apple cider, brown sugar and nutmeg. for spice bag, place cinnamon, allspice and the teaspoon of cloves in cheesecloth and tie. Add to cider mixture. Bring to boiling. Reduce heat, cover and simmer 10 minutes. Remove spice bag and discard. Serve cider with an orange wedge in each cup.

Musing on meanings

Agnostic searches for place in Christmas celebration, finds it at table

Last Christmas found me in Germany, left to my own devices, to celebrate the holiday. My German pal, Daniel, and I received the top of someone else's Christmas tree. We put it up in my apartment and decorated it with things borrowed from my place of employment. On Christmas morning, we opened the gifts of peanut butter and gum from my grandmother, and ate some fish sticks. After that we hopped the train to his hometown of Fulda, where I spent a few days being photographed by his father at every turn.

But that was all OK, because I was under the impression that the true meaning of Christmas was the celebration of Jesus' birth. I had a good time that Christmas. The wooden cross I wore around my neck was reassuring.

Then 1999 rolled around. Sometime in February I started to realize I wasn't "feeling" whatever it was everyone else seemed to feel during the Sunday night singalongs. When I did go to church, I felt out of place — like I was just pretending to believe in something I didn't.

Recently I realized what I really am — agnostic. And this is the point where people will whip out their Bibles, tell me they are praying for me and invite me to their church or to Christian Challenge — as if all I need is a little convincing. The thing is, I was regularly involved in the church from the time I was 7 through my freshman year of college, without my family, by the way. I own not one, but three Bibles, and I have read them.

This is my first Christmas as an agnostic. I let my mom put up the tree without me, because I don't think I should take part in the fun things about this time of year if I don't believe in the primary reason for it. I'm starting to feel like the one girl who was the Jehovah's Witness in elementary school who wasn't allowed to participate in any sort of holiday celebration. Maybe receiving and giving gifts also would be stupid for me from now on.

That's all wrong, too. I like to give gifts, and I definitely like to receive them. I like Christmas lights and singing carols and sending cards to far-flung family and friends. I like seeing old high school friends, and I like being out of school for a month. I love the idea of Christmas.

Is there a place for the lowly agnostic in the Christmas celebration, or is it more akin to a Muslim celebrating Yom Kippur? While the whole birth o' Jesus is the impetus for the holiday season, this time of year can be meaningful for everyone.

[Cue sentimental music].

The holiday season is a time for family and friends and eating a whole lot of food. It's a time for pumpkin pie, and hot chocolate, and candy canes, and turkey — don't forget the turkey. You see, the true meaning of Christmas is all about food, and even agnostics like to eat.

harsh reality

Normal holiday attractions lose allure due to parents' separation; reminders of pain continue today

JONATHAN KURCHE

The paper was red and white. I remember that.

It was doing a poor job of masking the contents of that box. I knew what was inside. Instinctively, I knew. Only one item could be so important as to require the participation of both of my parents. Only one item had the requisite weight distribution and symmetry that box had. There was only one thing I wanted that was so volumous, only one thing I had been trying to convince Santa/my parents to bring me that fit the package's physical description.

I was nine.

I used to pour through Service Merchandise catalogs looking for one, stopping to ogle and check prices. I used to count the money in my piggy bank and pour over my bankbooks to see if it was something I could buy. I used to calculate how much of my allowance would need to be saved over what period of time to afford it. The number changed every time. And here it was, in the box, wrapped in all the red and white tessellations of tiny Christmas trees.

It was a television, a new one — nothing special, the cheapest model available; no picture-in-picture, no buttons to press, no remote. You had to get up and switch the dial if you wanted to change from UHF to VHF stations. But it was mine — there, in the box in front of me, waiting for someone to liberate it.

I wasn't used to Christmases like this. There were a number of changes that Christmas, though.

For years, we used to go to the YWCA and find a tree among the Douglas firs bound and cut in rows. It wasn't quite as romantic as the time we tried driving to the country to cut the perfect tree, but it also was less painful than trudging through the snow with small children for a few hours. In the tree lots, we always could find a tree to agree on, and it was always real — prepackaged or not. There always was a certain mystery to the Christmas tree.

But that year, the tree wasn't real. It didn't require water. It was assembled, color-coded and stored in our basement. My mother didn't think she could handle a real tree on her own and felt that it might be easier to purchase a reusable one and save money. No one would need to set it up and adjust the height and haul it out to the trash when it began to lose needles.

That was good, because no one was around to do so.

One afternoon, I returned from a summer day camp to the news my parents had decided to separate. They officially hadn't divorced yet. They actually would wait until the following year, but my father moved out that summer. My mother, sister and I lived together in the house I grew up in. My mother was going to school and working to support us, so it was often my grandmother who fixed us dinner. When my mom got home from school, dinner would be waiting for her, also.

I usually was in bed by that point.

I remember all of the stuff piling up on our dining room table. It got to the point where the addition of one item would cause another to fall off. Much of the stuff on the table was bills, accumulating in some cases for as many as 18 months before receiving attention.

My father leased a single-bedroom apartment across from the high school in my hometown just north of Detroit. He would cook for my sister and I when we went to visit him Thursday nights and Fridays or Saturdays — depending on the week.

Dinners were usually tuna-noodle casserole or Polish sausage and macaroni. Dad would tell us that everything would be fine, and I always would tell him I knew that, even though I wasn't really certain.

My sister and I slept in cots at the apartment. We used old Army blankets for sheets.

There is a dirty business in the wake of separation. One day, Dad came over to the house to reclaim his furniture — the dining room table and a couch — leaving the house mostly empty. Life somehow seemed that way, too — like a house full of people without a couch to rest on.

I remember that Christmas, because my parents were trying to win my affection.

It was tradition that we celebrated Christmas Eve at my aunt and uncle's house — my dad's brother. It was the first Christmas Eve in memory at their house where mom wasn't present.

I got a Nintendo — the old 8-bit set. I remember playing "Super Mario Brothers" and "Duck Hunt" with my cousins before going back to dad's apartment. We spent the night at his place, then drove home early Christmas morning. I left the Nintendo at dad's.

When I returned home, there was another Nintendo waiting under the tree. It was a different one — from my mother. I paid less attention to it because it had lost its novelty.

There also was the box with the Christmas tree wrappings — the television.

I used to stay up late Fridays and watch "The Tonight Show" with Johnny Carson, back when it was still funny.

I remember doing his characteristic golf swing around the house and humming the theme song. I watched cartoons on that television, and other programs. Whenever something came on the downstairs television I didn't like, I always could run upstairs to my room and watch whatever I wanted. I could fall asleep, in the comfort of my bed, watching television. It was mine.

But despite the comfort such an appliance could bring, I didn't hide in my room and watch television often. Despite the fact that we now had two Nintendos in two different households, I didn't play video games much, either. I think I learned early what I know now: television is just an escape. When you turn it off, the world is still there — no matter how well it is packaged.

I still have that television — it sits in the basement. I don't think about it much, and I'm sure my parents have forgotten. But every once in a while, when it's time to wrap gifts, I come across that red and white paper.

I seal my parcels in it.

From mountaintops to ocean floors, world throwing New Year's parties

By HELEN O'NEILL
The Associated Press

The choices for ringing in this New Year are as endless as the ringing itself. From mountaintops to ocean floors the world will go a bit mad on Dec. 31, 1999, celebrating a madcap nonevent. The real millennium, after all, doesn't arrive until a year later.

Party beneath the pyramids in ballgowns after crossing the desert on a camel. Plunge into the waves at the 180th meridian for a midnight millennium dive. Plant first-light footprints in the snows of Kilimanjaro.

Or try the millennial mush: a dogsled ride into the wilds of Ontario for a champagne soiree under the Milky Way. (Don't forget to feed the dogs before breaking open the bubbly.)

The choices for ringing in this New Year are as endless as the ringing itself. From mountaintops to ocean floors the world will go a bit mad on Dec. 31, 1999, celebrating a madcap nonevent. The real millennium, after all, doesn't arrive until a year later.

But 2000 is the magic number and all over the world people will hike, dive, drink, drum and mush their way into the new year.

"It's all a lot of psyche and hype," said Robin Banerjee of Call of the Wild, an Ontario travel company organizing a dogsled extravaganza in the frozen forests of Algonquin Park. "Mostly it's just an excuse to have something to talk about, especially in January, " he says. "When everyone else says, 'I was in a bar on New Year's Eve,' you can say, 'Guess what I did?'"

Guess indeed. Banerjee promises New Year mushers that they will "feel like an explorer with the Hudson Bay Company" during a week-long expedition that include bonfires on frozen lakes and champagne under the stars — accompanied by companions named Snowball, Dagar and Spike.

Those who prefer champagne in the desert are also promised a trip back in time as they dance among the dunes in the shadow of the Sphinx.

"Caesar stood there," boasts the advertisement for the Chicago-based Millennial Society's "World Millennium Charity Ball" pyramid celebration. "So did Napoleon. And now you and your friends can greet the Year 2000 as the sun rises up out of the African desert and seven millennia of Egyptian history."

From the comfort of their luxury tents, ballgoers will witness an elaborate state-sponsored celebration, including a 12-hour opera that will transform the area around the Great Pyramids into an enormous, laser-lit stage for a cast of 1,000. On the stroke of midnight, a 30-foot golden pyramid will be flown by helicopter and placed atop the missing peak of the Great Pyramid of Cheops, flooding the area with rays to signal the birth of the first day.

Egypt isn't the only country harking back to centuries past to celebrate. In Britain, passengers can steam through the night steeped in Old World elegance aboard the Orient Express, ringing in the New Year with champagne and a Scots piper.

Peruvians will be busy with purification rituals and offerings to the moon at Sacsayhuaman, the Incan stone temple in Cuzco plundered in the early 16th century. Special effects will enhance the backdrop.

New Zealand will light a "beacon of hope," the first of a series of such beacons around the world, as Maoris perform their traditional haka war dance.

And in Romania, revelers can soak up the New Year at a medieval ball in Bran Castle, the craggy home of Vlad the Impaler, the 15th century prince who inspired Bram Stoker's "Dracula." The extravaganza, called "Blood Red," costs $3,995.

It's cheaper to waltz at Versailles.

For $2,429 a plate, guests can transport themselves back 300 years for a lavish reproduction supper with the Sun King. Among period costumes and court music of Louis XIV, they will dine on veal, truffles and wild strawberries in one of the world's most opulent settings. The party poses some logistical challenges. The 1,250-room palace has few restrooms and no kitchens: Dinner is prepared in buildings near the stables and dancing will be in a glass "palace" on the terrace.

But with plans for fireworks reflecting in Versailles' famous fountains — well, c'est magnifique.

Across the channel, Britons are calling London the "Millennium City."

It is, after all, the home of Greenwich, the spot from which time is measured all over the globe. London has orchestrated a four-day bash that organizers say will be the biggest street party since VE Day in 1945. There will be shows at the futuristic Millennium Dome, lavish fireworks, and a "river of fire," a 195-foot wall of flames that will streak up the Thames in the first seconds of the new year.

Five hours later the party will peak in New York's Times Square as a gigantic Waterford Crystal ball is lowered among the throngs. Festivities will include fireworks, lasers and thousands of helium balloons, as well as 4,000 pounds of confetti and an enormous puppet of Father Time drifting through the crowds. Giant video screens will broadcast images around the world.

In other ways the world will be connected as never before.

The All One Tribe Foundation in Taos, N.M., is organizing a global peace party in which people in towns around the world will drum simultaneously, chanting "As we drum, we are one."

Not that all the world will hear them. Some people will be too busy chasing time-zones on supersonic Concorde jetliners during millennial week, spending up to $75,000 each to take in capital cities around the world.

Others will be taking cruise ships into the first dawn. Precisely where that dawn rises is a matter of debate.

Several tiny islands in the South Pacific are fighting for first-light rights. In 1995, the island of Kiribati moved the international date line from the middle of the country to include its easternmost islands, meaning it will be the first place, in terms of longitude, to witness the sunrise. In disgust, its neighbor, Tonga, declared the true first dawn can be witnessed from its shores.

Meanwhile, Gisborne, in New Zealand, is planning a lavish celebration of its role as "the first city of the Sun." Festivities include a waterfront festival, where sunrise will be greeted by a flotilla of tall ships and traditional double-hulled canoes with sails. Two thousand cyclists are expected to descend on the city for the first ride into the first sun, while outside the city, thousands of Christians plan to camp out in tents as part of a reconciliation service called Servant 2000.

Closer to home, there are also squabbles about exactly where the first rays will fall.

In Maine, the tiny town of Lubec, population 2,000, believes it has the lock on the honor despite the U.S. Naval Observatory's declaration in September that Cadillac Mountain, just outside Bar Harbor, was the spot. After a local outcry, the observatory obligingly refigured its calculations to find that sunlight on Jan. 1 will hit both Cadillac Mountain and Lubec's Porcupine Mountain at precisely the same time: 7:04.

"It's neat to be first," said Sarah Matthews, who works in the Atlantic House coffee shop on Water Street. "People here are very proud of it."

For most people, firsts don't matter. The last seconds of the 1990s are quite simply a big excuse to party.

Mayor's Holiday Tree program supplies thousands of pounds of food to hungry

By LAUREN BEATTY
Kansas State Collegian

The switch was flipped on and the Christmas lights twinkled in the eyes of those who surrounded the tree.

But there were no gifts to be found under this tree.

Instead, the traditional lighting of the tree was part of the Mayor's Holiday Tree program designed to give food, instead of money, to those in need.

Eight-thousand people have called on the Flint Hills Breadbasket for food this year, Mayor Roger Reitz said Monday night at the 13th-annual tree-lighting ceremony.

"No one is starving, but some people are hungry," Reitz said.

Food-drive volunteers have collected 200,000 pounds of food, including an 80,000-pound donation of cereal from a corporate sponsor, Shirley Bramhall, Breadbasket director, said.

More than 300 people donated the food.

Reitz said he is proud of his community for all the work that was put into this year's drive, but the need has not been met fully.

Bramhall said she agreed.

"We're really up there, but we could still use more," Bramhall said. "We appreciate the donation, but it's hard to make a Christmas dinner with cereal. We need turkeys, chickens, canned fruit — anything you use to make your Christmas dinner, we need."

The food will be collected into baskets and distributed on Dec. 20 and 21. Volunteers also are needed to create and deliver the baskets.

The Mayor's Holiday Tree was created in 1986 by then-mayor Rick Mann.

"I had the privilege of serving the community as mayor, and I realized that there was no program like this during this time of the year," Mann said.

Mann then contacted the Aggieville Business Association and the Flint Hills Breadbasket to organize a food drive for people less fortunate.

Mann said the program just blossomed. Now there is a committee that plans the event year-round.

"A significant addition came when K-State and Ruth Ann Wefald got involved. Thanks to the support of the students, faculty and staff, this program has grown significantly," Mann said.

Mann also said the program is distinctive because the food that is raised in Manhattan stays in Manhattan.

Santa Claus also made an appearance and asked the city officials to gather around.

"Congratulations, Manhattan, on what you have done," Reitz said.

Investigation continues into Fiji fraternity's alleged hazing

■ Substance-abuse policy violations also levied against Phi Gamma Delta.

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Alleged violations of the Greek Affairs' substance abuse policy and human rights code have been brought against the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity.

Specific information concerning the current investigation has not been made available. A formal hearing will be at 9 p.m. Tuesday in the Director's Conference Room in the K-State Student Union.

Interfraternity Council president Mike Goodpasture said the hearing is designed to be the finalized format of an investigation process. The party that addressed the complaint will be given the opportunity to voice its views, and the Fijis will as well.

If the fraternity is found to have violated the substance-abuse policy or human-rights code, Goodpasture said penalties would depend on the seriousness of the offense. He said fines are the normal punishment.

Fiji president Greg Ernzen was not available for comment.

In the past two years, violations of the human rights code resulted in the suspension of the Kappa Alpha Psi and Acacia fraternities and the Delta Delta Delta sorority being put on probation. The two fraternities no longer exist at K-State, and the sorority is on social probation until January.

ACLU donation to local library upsets residents

By DANICA COTO
Kansas State Collegian

Some residents are upset that the Manhattan Public Library received an $873.31 donation Tuesday, saying this money should be returned to the city and the taxpayers.

The American Civil Liberties Union donated the amount after paying its lead counsel, Americans United for Separation of Church and State, with money won from its $12,000 lawsuit.

This lawsuit was filed in September by the ACLU, which wanted the Ten Commandments monolith removed from in front of City Hall because it violated the First Amendment clause of separation of church and state. City commissioners settled the lawsuit by awarding ACLU the money.

Recall committee members, who want to remove commissioner Karen McCulloh from office for voting to remove the monolith, disagree with the donation.

"As far as the library goes, Lord knows the library needs every nickel, dime and penny it can get," said Don Rose, recall committee member.

But the ACLU didn't return the money where it came from — it sent the money to the library, Rose said.

Recall committee members are questioning why the money was donated to the library and why at this moment.

"They're doing it one week before before the election. If they had given it one day after the election, I wouldn't feel the way I do," Rose said. "It's an attempt to let the electorate feel, 'Gee whiz, the ACLU is great.'"

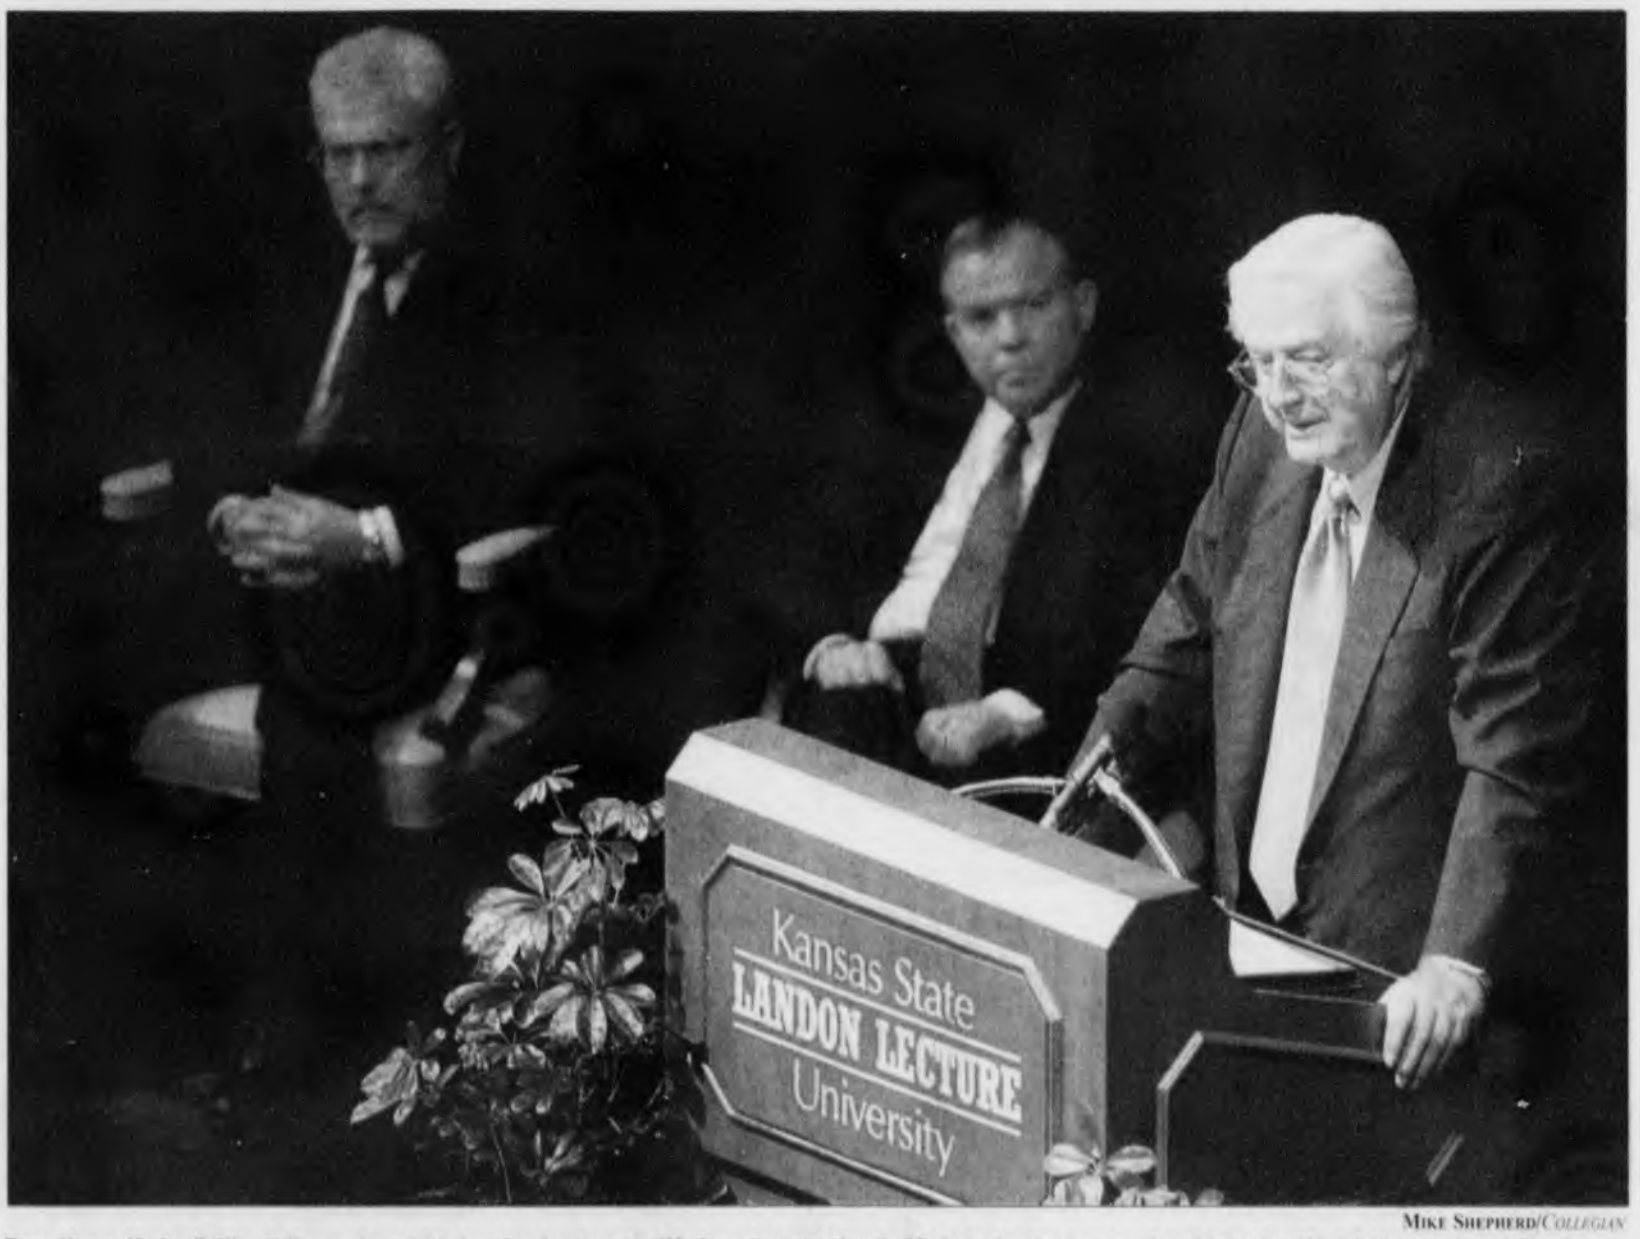
However, Dirk Kurtenbach disagreed. The ACLU executive director of Kansas and Western Missouri said its timing had nothing to do with the recall election. It was related to complaints from ACLU members.

"We wanted to do something to bring attention to the fundamental principle," Kurtenbach said, referring to the monolith issue. "It was an effort to let our members know that this would clear up the controversy."

Manhattan ACLU members were concerned that the criticism leveled at the ACLU was a distraction from the real issue, which was the monolith and not the money.

Despite arguments from both sides concerning the timing of the donation, Kurtenbach said the issue was settled.

"It was our money. We can do anything we want with money received from the ACLU," he said.



Commissioner Bruce Snead said he agreed.

"We decided these were reasonable legal costs. What the ACLU does with their money is something City Commission has no control over," Snead said. "Once the settlement is made, it's not the city's money anymore."

Although no action will be taken by the recall committee, Rose said it's an insult that the money isn't being returned to the city and taxpayers.

As to why the money was donated a week before the recall election, Snead said he could understand the recall committee's viewpoint.

"It can be viewed in a political context, but I'm not surprised that they raised that issue," he said. "People always wonder why certain things happen when they do."

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., delivers the 115th Landon Lecture on Wednesday morning in McCain Auditorium as President Jon Wefald (center) and Charles Reagan (left), chairman of the series, look on. Hyde spoke about the connection between moral values and politics.

Culture & Democracy

"Our culture is formed by what we believe, what we think, what we cherish, what we honor."

— Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill.

Hyde says politics, culture tightly linked

By TRACY DOILE
Kansas State Collegian

Culture is linked tightly with politics and democracy, Rep. Henry Hyde said Wednesday at the 115th Landon Lecture, in McCain Auditorium.

Hyde, R-Ill., discussed the relationshp between American culture and politics.

"Our culture is formed by what we believe, what we think, what we cherish, what we honor," Hyde said. "What we believe, think, cherish and honor is expressed by the books we read, the stories we tell, the poetry we write, the plays we attend, the music we listen to, the paintings we admire, the sculpture we erect, the buildings we design, and so on and so on."

This account of what culture is conflicts with what it is often mistaken for today, he said.

"Culture has largely been identified with certain artifacts, certain things — movies, videos, CDs, Web sites and so forth," he said.

Hyde used the biblical story of Moses coming down from Mt. Sinai to define the power of a culture.

"Moses finds people worshiping a golden calf, a false object of honor," he said. "To worship a false god inevitably led to a corrupt culture. Living nobly means that we all must avoid the worship of false gods."

Hyde said ignoring this fundamental human condition is detrimental to Americans.

"Culture properly understood counts a great deal," Hyde said.

Hyde said government has a commitment to respecting and protecting people's inalienable right to life. Liberty and the pursuit of happiness are characteristic of and closely associated with American culture, and it is the responsibility of the American people to understand the moral truths that underlie this right.

"It takes a certain kind of people to make democracy work, and that means it takes a certain kind of culture to make democracy work," Hyde said, "for the character of a people is a

Wildcats accept conditional bid to Holiday Bowl

By JOSHUA KINDER
Kansas State Collegian

The wait is over for the No. 7 K-State Wildcats.

On Wednesday, K-State (10-1) and the Big 12 Conference announced that the Wildcats would accept an invitation to play in the Culligan Holiday Bowl on Dec. 29 in San Diego, Calif., against the Pac-10 Conference's second-place team, the Washington Huskies (7-4). The deal will be final Sunday assuming Nebraska is the only Big 12 representative in the Bowl Championship Series.

If the Cornhuskers were to plunge into the Nokia Sugar Bowl to play for the National Championship against Florida State, K-State would have the opportunity to play in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl in Tempe, Ariz. In order for that to happen, the Huskers would have to roll to an easy victory against the Texas Longhorns in the Big 12 Championship game on Saturday.

A visit to the Holiday Bowl would mark the first bowl matchup between K-State and a Pac-10 opponent.

"Following joint consultation with all the parties, including Kansas State, the Big 12 Conference, the Holiday Bowl and the Cotton Bowl, it was mutually agreed upon that this scenario would be consistent with the new policy agreed to by the Conference and both bowls that permits the Cotton Bowl to have access to the

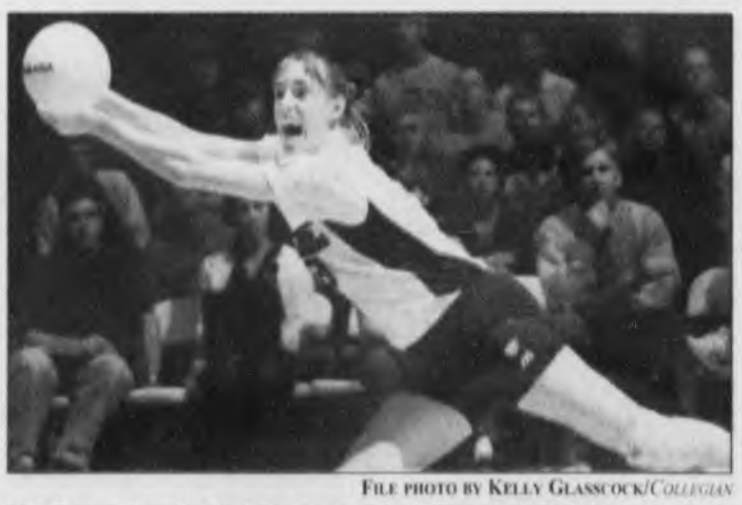
Volleyball team to begin NCAA play

By CHRISTOPHER MCLEMORE
Kansas State Collegian

Don't blame the K-State volleyball team if it plays a little harder tonight than usual.

After all, it's got a trip to Hawaii on the line.

K-State (20-8) begins play in the first round of the NCAA Tournament tonight in Fort Collins, Colo. against Conference USA member Louisville (19-11).



If the Cats win tonight, they will play again Friday against the winner of today's other first-round matchup between host Colorado State and Loyola of Chicago.

The Cats haven't made any dramatic adjustments in preparation for Louisville but feel confident nonetheless.

"We've made a few subtle changes, but not many," head coach Jim McLaughlin said. "If we play like we have played all year, we feel like we can beat anybody."

If K-State can get past Louisville and the Colorado State-Loyola winner, they would advance to the NCAA regionals. Regional winners then advance to the NCAA semifinals in Honolulu.

Of course, before the Cats can start thinking about enjoying a weekend on the beach, they have to get past their first-round opponent, Louisville.

Julie Thomas dives for a ball in a game against Missouri. K-State begins play in the first round of the NCAA Tournament tonight in Fort Collins, Colo.

"We've got to focus on our opponent," McLaughlin said. "We've got to be good on our side of the net."

This trip to the NCAA Tournament is the fourth in a row for the Wildcats, and the third in a row under McLaughlin. Last year, the Cats advanced to the second round, but lost that match against Brigham Young University.

This year, K-State hopes to advance even further than the second round.

"I think we've got a chance," McLaughlin said. "We've been good on the road, and we've won some tough games."

K-State's tough schedule included two early season match-ups against No. 7 Long Beach State and No. 1 Penn State. Although the Cats lost both matches, McLaughlin said he feels those matches served as great preparation for the games they will play in the NCAA tournament.

"We needed to be in some tough environments," McLaughlin said. "That has helped us throughout the season."

The tournament also marks the last few games for seniors Dawn Cady and Heather Lindell.

Cady recently was named to the All-

Infant found dead in creek Tuesday near Junction City

JUNCTION CITY — An infant was found dead in a rural Geary County creek, in northeast Kansas, the county attorney said.

The body was recovered Tuesday by Kansas Bureau of Investigation agents, Geary County sheriff's deputies and divers from Fort Riley, Geary County Attorney Chris Biggs said.

No other information has been released.

Biggs said the case is under investigation by the KBI.

Student granted permission to transfer after racial slurs

NICKERSON, Kan. — School officials in Hutchinson decided Wednesday to grant a transfer request from a black student who wanted to leave his Nickerson high school after a racial slur and threats were found in the school's restroom.

Hutchinson Superintendent Gary Price and assistant superintendent Bob Rathbun met this morning with the student, Jeffery Hubbard, and his mother, Jane Hubbard.

It then was decided there were enough extenuating circumstances to allow the 14-year-old boy to transfer to Hutchinson High School.

"The student indicated his feeling of not being safe at Nickerson," Price said. "Although we believe he would be safe at Nickerson High School, we respect his perceptions and understand that feeling safe in school is important for academic sucess."

Jeffery Hubbard's request originally was denied by school officials who cited a district policy that limits transfers to the start of the year or the start of a trimester.

The second trimester at Hutchinson began Nov. 16. The racial slur and threats were discovered in the bathroom at Nickerson on Nov. 19.

Hubbard is one of two black students at Nickerson. The other black student, 15-year-old Ashley Washington, plans to stay at the school.

Hubbard lives in Hutchinson, but his house is five houses west of the dividing line between Hutchinson USD 308 and Nickerson-South Hutchinson USD 309.

Hubbard hasn't been at school since the graffiti discovery and the Thanksgiving break.

Earlier, Price said he would look at the transfer request, but he likely would go along with the recommendation of school officials not to approve it.

Hubbard originally was enrolled at Hutchinson but transferred to Nickerson because he has friends who go there.

Jane Hubbard said she doesn't feel it is safe for her son to go to Nickerson.

"It was not our choice to leave," Jane Hubbard said. "He's the victim here. I'm not expecting them to bend their laws for just a whim, but this is different."

Denver police plan changes to procedure after man shot

DENVER — Police have changed their policy on so-called no-knock search warrants because one man was killed in an apparently unfounded raid.

Ismael Mena, 45, was shot eight times by Denver SWAT officers during a Sept. 29 raid.

Officers said they found Mena in a shooting stance, pointing a gun at officers and refusing to lower it.

Mena's son, Heriberto Mena, said his father's friends and neighbors think he might have thought he was protecting himself against an intruder.

Police and Denver district attorney's office are investigating.

Under the new policy, a police supervisor now must approve all requests for search warrants written by street officers.

It was instituted Nov. 10 as a result of the Mena case, a police spokesman, Sgt. Tony Lombard, said.

Police recover stolen goods by bidding at online auction

BALTIMORE — Having all but given up hope of recovering a prayer shawl and other religious items stolen from his car, Morris Sochaccewski took the advice of a friend and looked for the items online.

Sure enough, on the online auction site eBay, he found what he was looking for: "Beautiful Hebrew Prayer Set in 2 blue velvet pouches," the description read.

A few clicks and a $395 bid later, Officer Ken Driscoll arrived at the seller's home, eight blocks from Sochaccewski's house.

The woman who sold the items told police she bought them at a flea market. Police did not identify the woman, who is helping in the investigation of the October theft from Sochaccewski's car.

Kevin Pursglove, an eBay spokesman, said only a tiny fraction of the 400,000 items offered for sale on the site daily are believed to be stolen.

"Perhaps the dumbest place to try to fence stolen materials is on eBay," Pursglove said. "You've got millions of eyeballs tuned into the site everyday, and most of your transactions can be traced."

'Nutcracker' ballet goes on despite musicians' absence

NEW YORK — Elena Stein didn't mind that a tape and not a 70-piece orchestra played Tchaikovsky's familiar score at Lincoln Center's lavish production of "The Nutcracker."

The 8-year-old girl's parents — the people who paid $76 a ticket for the show — weren't so sure.

"It sounded like they were playing anyway," Elena said during intermission of the holiday classic.

"I thought it was a little flat and not as exciting," said Michael Stein, of Norwalk, Conn. "I missed the orchestra."

The orchestra pit has been empty since last week because of a labor dispute between the ballet and the musicians, represented by Local 802 of the American Federation of Musicians.The New York City Ballet chose to go ahead with taped music rather than cancel the beloved show.

"We, the New York City Ballet management, wish to fulfill our mandate to the public, which is to perform," company officials said in a statement passed out to the audience.

"We do not want a darkened theater, with many unemployed — stagehands, ushers, staff and, of course, dancers not dancing."

Ticketholders were offered the option of getting their money back, but ballet spokesman Robert Daniels said few have requested refunds since "Nutcracker" started its run Friday.

The seats at Tuesday's performance were about 65-percent full, which Daniels said was average for the week after Thanksgiving.

The dispute, which management calls a strike and a union spokeswoman referred to as a lockout, is not about wages.

Instead, management wants to change work rules that allow musicians to hire substitutes for rehearsals or performances.

"Many of our musicians are consistently conscientious about attending both; some are not, with the result that some performances are not satisfactory, either because some musicians are unrehearsed or because substitutes are likewise unprepared," the company said Tuesday in a full-page ad in The New York Times.

Union spokeswoman Judy West said there have never been any complaints.

K-State-Salina expands intramurals

BY KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While the Wildcats are off the turf awaiting their next opponent in a bowl game, a group of students from K-State and K-State-Salina took the field.

The Purple Aces from K-State-Salina played the Naked Bootleggers in an exhibition flag football game Tuesday night at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. The match was part of a restructuring of the flag football program at the Salina campus, said Mariana Lebron, K-State-Salina assistant director of college advancement for student life.

"Athletics is a big component of some of our students' lives here, and the program has continued to grow," Lebron said. "The students needed to have a good, basic structure in place because it is the essence of student life and leadership."

Lebron said this is the second year for flag football on the Salina campus. She said this year, however, the students wanted a more structured program.

Five teams competed in intramural flag football this year, complete with a painted field, uniforms and a more competition.

"This new program brought a new spirit to our athletic program here," Lebron said. "When the students are competing, there is a sense of pride not only for their team, but for their university."

"When the students are competing, there is a sense of pride not only for their team, but for their university."

— Mariana Lebron, assistant director of college advancement for student life at K-State-Salina

Lebron said that when the restructuring of the flag football program began, it was discussed that the champion from Salina would play the champion from the Manhattan campus in an exhibition game.

Tom Karcz, captain of the Purple Aces and sophomore in airway science and professional pilot, said they were scheduled to play the team from Delta Upsilon but instead played the Naked Bootleggers. He said a score was not kept, but the Naked Bootleggers won the game.

"Flag football is very popular around here, and it keeps getting bigger," Karcz said. "The Naked Bootleggers were an awesome team, and even though we lost, it was a lot of fun.

"I hope the two campuses continue to compete like this, because it is good for the entire university."

Karcz said his team was the defending champion going into this year and was undefeated in the inaugural season. He said although this season was not as successful, the team still was victorious and became the champion again.

He said the reorganization of the program helped because it gave the teams more of a structure to follow.

"The guys all worked hard this year, and we wanted to come back and defend our title," Karcz said. "The new system helped fairly well because everything was written down and explained thoroughly."

Lebron said the increase in participation in the flag football program is leading to more intramural activities being offered at Salina. Basketball and a new intramural, sport softball, both will be played this year.

"This is something we needed," Lebron said. "There was a feeling among the students that they needed something to be a part of. This is now a beginning for a new tradition at Salina."

Karcz said the intramural program is good for K-State-Salina because of its growing number of students and the lack of extracurricular opportunities.

"This is a good thing for student life," Karcz said. "We are growing each year and are the fastest growing of all of the colleges. With more kids, we need more opportunities. Intramural sports gives us something to be a part of."

On-campus apartments offer low-cost, convenient housing for variety of students

BY SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jardine Terrace Apartments offer more living opportunities than many K-State students might be aware of.

"The assumption is made that Jardine is just for married students," Stephanie Bannister, Jardine coordinator, said. "Really, it's housing for just about anyone affiliated with the university."

There are three categories of people who can live in these apartments, Bannister said.

First preference is given to married couples and families. They can be undergraduate or graduate students, she said.

After that, single graduate students have the opportunity to live in the apartments. Then, faculty, staff and visiting scholars can live there under limited lease agreements for up to one year, she said.

The two relatively new apartments, William's Place and Wily Apartments, cater to single students rather than families. William's Place houses single graduate students and single faculty and staff. Children are not allowed there, Bannister said.

Wily, which consists of three buildings, gives preference to single undergraduate or graduate students, she said.

Bannister said the university will maintain its efforts to house families while working to create more housing opportunities for single students.

"Originally, the sole purpose has been to provide housing for married students and families, and then they built William's and Wily," she said. "But, we're always going to maintain our first priority, and that's married students and families."

The recent changes and additions were made to accommodate a growing student population, Bannister said.

"As residence halls became increasingly full, the decision was made to provide undergraduate housing," she said.

Construction on Jardine began in the 1950s, and it has been undergoing constant renovations ever since, Bannister said.

There now are more than 500 units available for renting. The approximate population for all apartments is 1,000, Bannister said.

Chuck Werring, director of the Department of Housing and Dining Services, said there are no current plans to build or renovate more off-campus apartments at this time.

"It will depend on the market," he said. "Right now, I can't guarantee anything."

Connie Bingham, housing and dining office specialist, said living in Jardine offers many advantages to students.

"It's clean. It's affordable," she said. "We have an excellent maintenance department. We're close to campus. We have good security. It's a close community environment."

Although Jardine houses many people, the student perception of the apartment is often still wrong, Werring said.

"When I first came here, I kept hearing the word 'ghetto.' It tripped my trigger a little bit," he said. "Jardine is not cheap housing. It's affordable. We want to provide affordable housing to folks attending Kansas State University."

Bannister said the lease caters to the average college student.

"The lease is more student-friendly," she said. "Our housing agreement is written for the academic year, unlike many apartments in town."

Living in Jardine allows students to stay active in the university while living on their own, Bannister said.

"It offers community and continuity to the university that students might not find elsewhere," she said. "We encourage students to learn more about Jardine. If you view an apartment from the outside, you don't see what it has to offer."

Precautions available to remain safe on Web

Amy Boyers gave Liam Youens the brush-off on Valentine's Day in 1995. The two were in 10th grade. Little did she know that event, coupled with easily available information on the Internet, would lead to her death in 1999.

On Oct. 15, Youen burst into a dentist's office looking for Boyers, whom he tracked down using the Internet. With the punch of a few keys on his keyboard, Youens was able to find Boyers' birth certificate, her Social Security number and the address of her dentist's office. He shot and killed Boyers and then himself.

Although the final chapters of his life and Boyers' life are written and concluded, the debate over the right to privacy on the Internet rages on — especially after their final episode. At first glance, it appears the guilty party is the Net. However, Youen's obsession was so great that with or without the World Wide Web, he was a threat to Boyers.

The only reasonable conclusion that can be reached from their tragic stories is that Youen was a psycho, and for most of us, having information about us available on the Web will never be such a problem.

However, if you fear easy access to your records on the Web, there are things you can do to protect yourself.

Be smart when using the Web. Know that like going out alone after dark, giving information about yourself over the Internet is risky business. There is no reason anyone but the Internal Revenue Service and possibly your bank needs to know your Social Security number. So, do not give it out over the Internet to anyone else.

Your mailbox holds as much or more information about you as the Internet does. Someone rifling through your mail could find your credit card numbers and vital information more easily than someone surfing the Web. If you give your credit card number over the Web, most Web sites have safeguards against theft of that number. But take extra precautions. Be sure to log off when you finish using the Web.

The Internet is similar to the phone book. If you don't want the information out there, you are responsible for making sure it isn't. That means not registering with companies online and not allowing phone books to publish information about you.

Information is knowledge, and knowledge is power. The Internet is a wonderful tool, because it gives us access to information and power. But like all power, it is easily corrupted unless it is used properly. So, take precautions and be safe when playing, working or surfing the Internet.

MISSIN' OUT on the BIRTHDAY FUN

Christmas birthday means spending time at home with family, less time in Aggieville

ERIN SCHNEWEIS

It is one of the top-three birthdays.

Your 16th birthday means you can drive without using the goin-to-school or runnin-an-errand excuse. Your 18th birthday signifies wasted money on lottery tickets and buying spray paint at Wal-Mart. For you perverts out there, I am not even going to discuss what that means for you. The third birthday that is extremely important is the easier-alcohol-accessibility stage.

Two of the three already have passed in my life. My 21st birthday is right around the corner. To top it all off, it's even on a Saturday.

What could be the downfall of celebrating your 21st birthday on a Saturday? Did I mention that my birthday is on Christmas Day?

As my friend Wes puts it, "It's not your 21st birthday unless you get drunk."

Well, what I am I supposed to do for that kind of fun? Instead of leaving Santa a glass of milk and cookies, maybe I'll stay up and drink a few shots of Vodka with him.

No going to Rusty's Last Chance for me. I will be chasing my cousins around and playing hide and seek. If I am lucky, I will be playing tag football with my extended family.

When I was younger, it was far worse. I rarely got to have a birthday party that was even around my actual birthday.

One of the worst things, especially when you are younger, is the economic situation in December. The golden rule in that department is if you think you are broke in September, you will consider yourself destitute in December. There rarely are exceptions to this rule.

My parents and family always have been good about keeping the two holidays as separate as possible.

Yet some people would tend to forget. My detective work at the age of 7 made me realize that Merry Christmas was usually written on the package or gift in marker or on a gift card. Then hastily written in pen was "Happy Birthday, too!"

There are some advantages to having a birthday on Christmas. Like the time I was pulled over in Oklahoma at 1:30 in the morning. I was going over the speed limit. Since my family reads my columns, I will not elaborate on how fast I was driving. Another charge against me, the officer said, is to dim the lights when someone is, quote, "within 500 feet of you."

When the officer took my I.D., he wasn't a friendly camper. But then, when he saw my license, we started talking about how my birthday was on Christmas.

The officer gave me an early birthday present, nine months before the big day: no ticket.

Don't get me wrong, it is an honor to celebrate my birthday with someone so important. But why couldn't it be on Friday this year? Bars are open Dec. 24.

Maybe I will find some moonshine or some of grandpa's cough medicine under the tree.

Yet something is telling me that I will be as sober as a nun on my big day. No three sheets to the wind or thinking my kitchen floor is a swimming pool.

Unless, that is, Santa spikes the punch or fills my stocking with some Bud Light.

Pain part of life for women trying to look their best

SARAH BAHARI

Jerry. That's what my so-called uncle affectionately calls me. No, it's not a middle name or a childhood nickname or anything nice like that. He calls me Jerry after the great Jerry Seinfeld. Not for my humor, quick wit or ability to make people laugh. It's because of my slightly abnormal amount of body hair.

So, yes, I'll admit it. I have bushy eyebrows. Actually, they're totally out of control. I can't help it. I'm half Iranian. It's a foreigner thing, I guess.

Well, this Thanksgiving, I was determined to put an end to this nickname. I gave up the endless attempts at plucking my brows into thin, shaped arcs and headed to the scary beauty salon.

Now, I've never been a huge fan of salons. I'm pretty sure they were invented by someone from Johnson County. (Really, nobody else answers the question, "Where are you from?" with a county.) Anyway, something about the smell of all the hair products and all the people hoping to achieve new looks kind of makes me nauseated. As you can imagine, I was less than thrilled that I was going through with this.

Regardless, I was hauled off into the back room, where they had a chair set up just awaiting the pain that would be sure to follow this cruel and unusual procedure. And so, the torture began.

First, the cute little lady, whom I now refer to as the facial hair Nazi, started with my upper lip. Yes, I also have a little bit of a mustache. Really, who doesn't, though? So much for discretion, girls. She ripped the hair off my lip fairly quickly. On the pain scale, it ranked pretty low. I think the skin there might be a little tougher than other places.

Next, it was on to the eyebrows. I would recommend to anyone who is planning some sort of torturous revenge to invest in some hot oil and paper strips. I promise it will work. The facial hair Nazi started on shaping the brows. As it is, my pain tolerance isn't too high. I truly thought I was going to die of pain. Good thing I don't plan on having any children.

The lady continued to rip away the hair, each time showing me the masses of little hairs on the paper strips that she took from my eyebrows. I was amazed that much hair came from only two brows.

As the hair Nazi continued ripping away the hair, she looked at me and said, "Oh, don't look like man no more." If you had listened really closely, you could actually hear some of my self-esteem plummeting to its fateful crash. Did I really look like a man before that? Maybe I really do look like Jerry Seinfeld. I didn't think my facial hair was that out of control.

So, she finished on my eyebrows. They now were shaped, little lines. I was impressed with her work and happy I wasn't quite as manly as before. I picked up my bruised ego off the floor and left the salon.

After that, I had to ask myself if my new eyebrows were worth the pain. For some reason, my answer is yes. People should be themselves, but anybody who says looking your best doesn't make you feel good is lying. It sucks what women have to go through to look their best, but it's life. As long as women are trying to look their best and not like someone else's best, minor, painful procedures are okay to endure. They are not, and never will be fun, but beauty is pain, right?

When I got home and saw my uncle, he took one look at me and said, "How've you been, Jerry?" So, some things will never change, and I am more than OK with that.

Is it possible to get Snyder for basketball coach?

READERS write

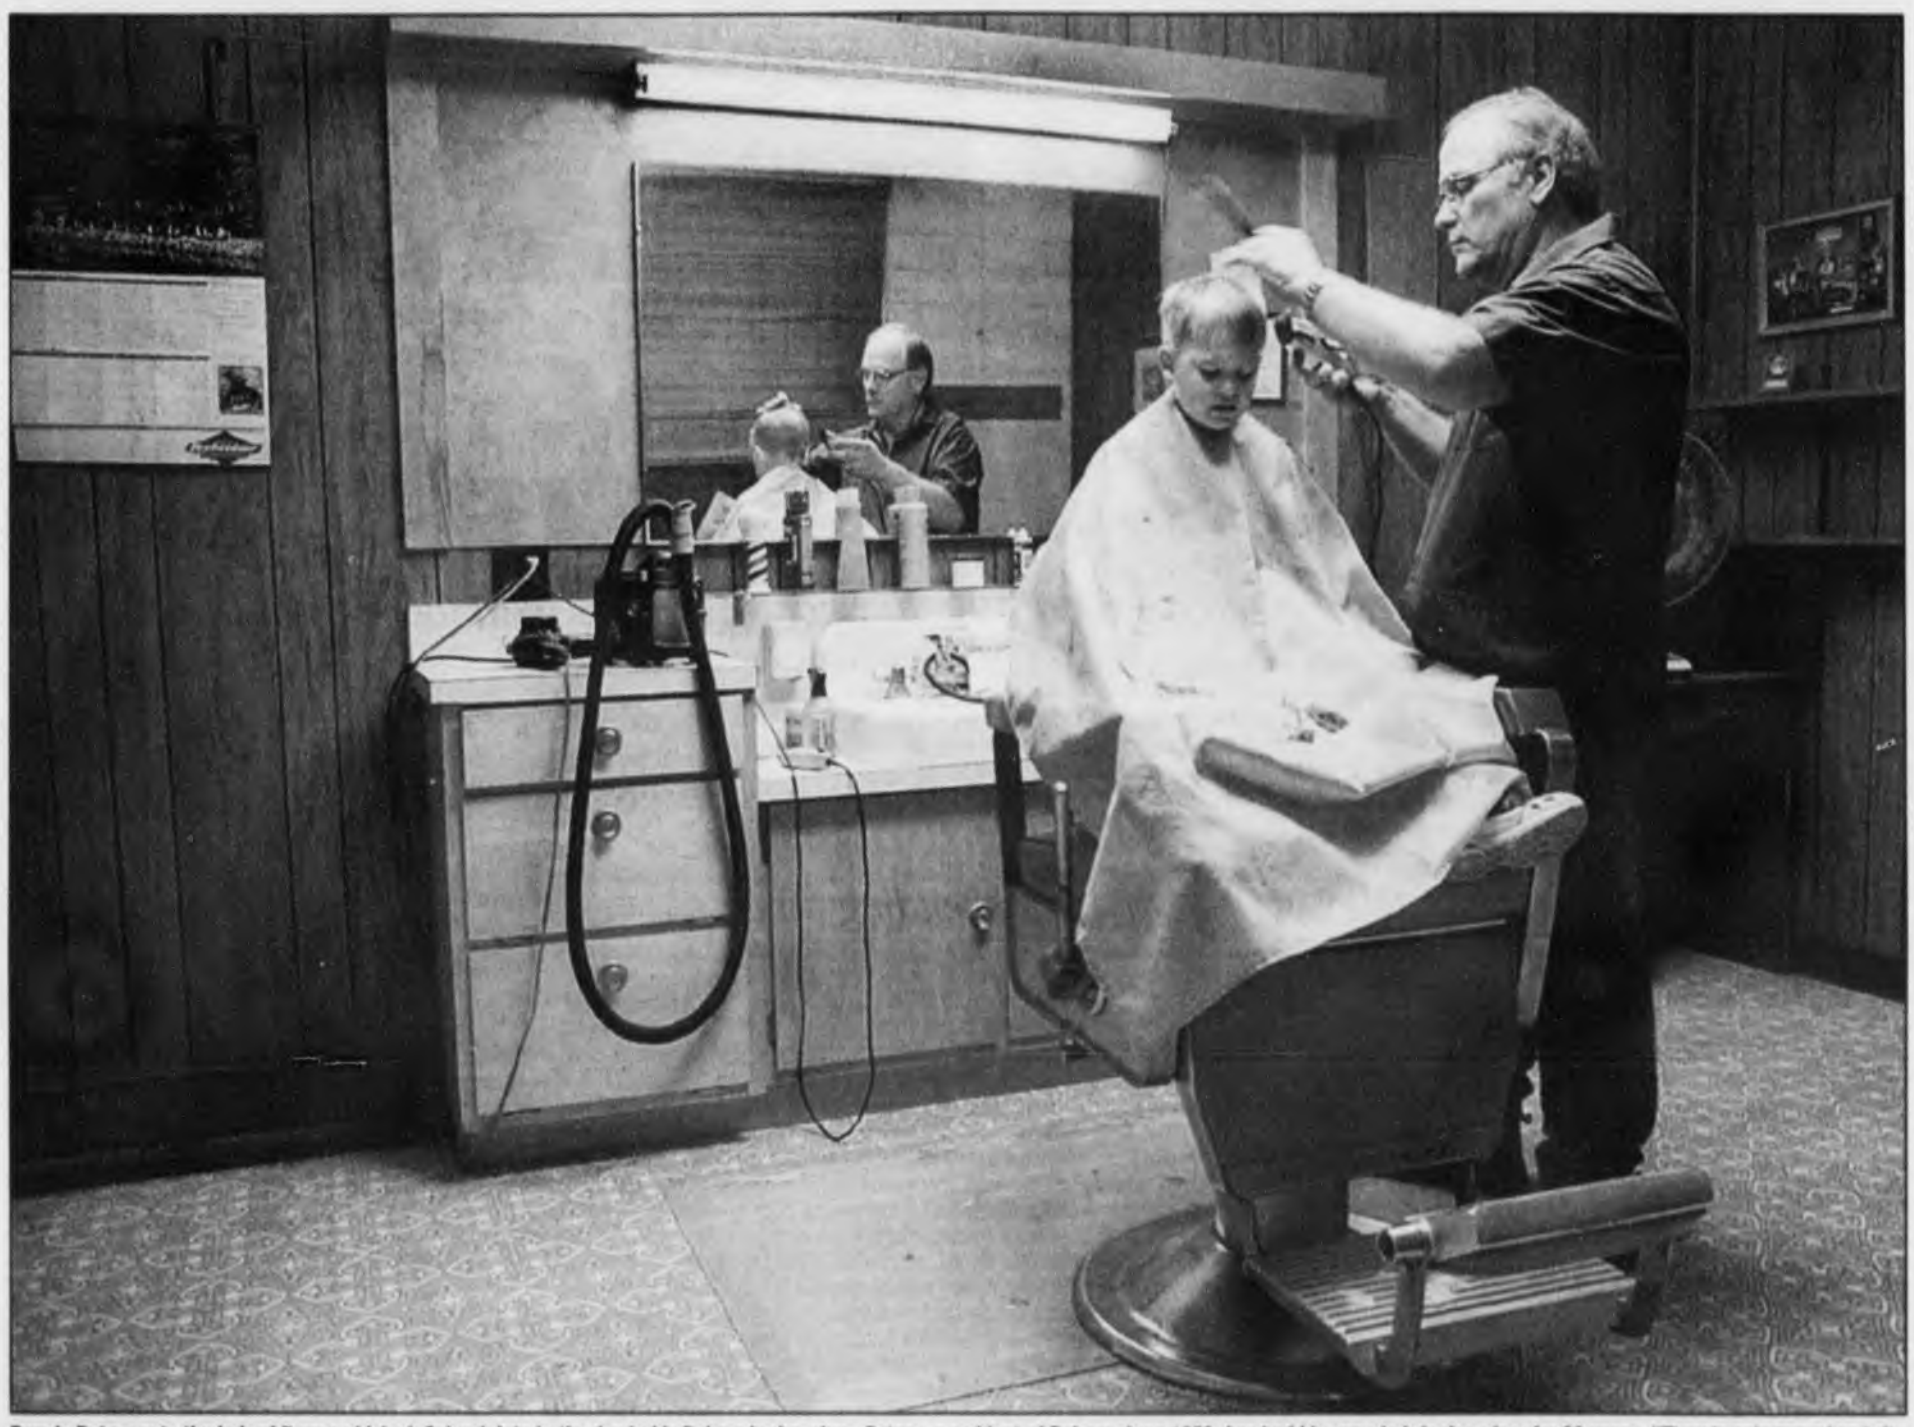
Snyder should consider fans, media before nixing Cotton Bowl invitation

Editor,

I've heard several unofficial reports of the possibility Coach Bill Snyder would turn down a bid to the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl. If these reports are true, I would like to urge Snyder to reconsider his position on this matter. What does he expect to gain by this act of defiance? All it will do is shed poor light on a team he has tried so hard to keep above such petty tantrums. The media would have a field day with us. How can a team that was voted the worst in college football just 10 years ago turn down a New Year's Day bowl? It makes absolutely no sense.

He also needs to take a step back and think about his fans. These are the same fans who see him as a man who could walk on water. How does he think they will react to making flight plans to San Diego in the middle of the week, rather than driving seven short hours on a weekend? Does he really think he could get 45,000 fans to fill the Culligan Holiday Bowl like he could the Cotton Bowl? Not a chance.



What about the feelings of his players? Look what happened last year when they were forced to accept a bowl bid which was beneath them. It took an uninspired team to lose that ball game. We cannot allow that to happen again. I beg you, Snyder, do not make a mistake that will affect the entire K-State family. Think about how it affect us all.

Keeping Alive

a small town

Dennis Peters cuts the hair of 5-year-old Jack Schwab late in the day in his Palmer barber shop. Peters, a resident of Palmer since 1953, has had his one-chair barber shop for 22 years. "There's only two of us left in Washington County," he said.

Peters cuts hair for three hours every Tuesday through Saturday morning and for two hours on Wednesday nights. He used to have hours on Thursday nights until it interfered with his attendance to his children's high school sporting events.

When it's quitting time in Palmer, Dennis Peters remains on the job

STORY AND PHOTOS BY MIKE SHEPHERD

PALMER, Kan. – The phone rang shortly before 7 on a Friday morning, just as Dennis Peters was sitting down to breakfast.

A farmer's combine ran out of fuel, the person on the other end of the line said, just as another day of harvest was getting under way. As the area's lone bulk-fuel transporter, Peters had no choice but to leave for work an hour early.

Peters doesn't usually leave for work until 8 a.m., which is when he walks a short half-block to downtown to open his barber shop.

He is also the only barber in town.

By the time he had returned from the unexpected fuel call, he had two men waiting for a haircut. They didn't mind. They knew he had the other job.

The two men got their trim, and the morning dragged on slowly. At 10:30, Peters decided to close the shop for the day and get an early start on his fuel deliveries.

That's how he usually does it — cut hair in the morning and deliver fuel in the afternoon. After he's finished, he drives five miles up the road to Linn, where he owns Peters Country Mart, the only convenience store between Clay Center and Washington.

"There's times I wish I had just one thing to do," Peters said. "You have to do it, so you do it.

"In a small town like this, if one business quits, they all quit. Everyone depends on everyone else."

There are about a dozen businesses in Palmer these days. There's a bank, a hardware store and lumber yard. There's a grocery, a service station, a cafe, a dairy and a grain company. There's even a local portrait photographer who does senior pictures and weddings.

And, of course, there's Peters' line of services.

"I've thought about giving that up, but where would people go to get haircuts?" Peters said of his barber shop.

Peters mops around the coolers at his convenient store in Linn. He and his wife opened the store in 1995 as a service to the residents. "Before, if the kids wanted a pop after a game, they had to drive to Washington," he said. Now, kids can get a pop and a hamburger at the store after their high school games.

Cats collect post-season hardware

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As the No. 7 K-State football team awaits the official announcement of which bowl game they'll be attending, post-season awards have started to be distributed.

SIMONEAU

Head coach Bill Snyder was named GTE Coach of the Year for Region 4 after guiding the Cats to a 10-1 record this year. K-State now is one of five schools to win at least nine games in each of the past seven seasons, and one of just two schools to win 10 games in three consecutive seasons.

Seven Wildcats have received first-team All-Big 12 honors. Three seniors in linebacker Mark Simoneau, defensive end Darren Howard and safety Lamar Chapman were named on the defensive unit, while on offense it was junior receiver Quincy Morgan, junior punt returner David Allen, junior placekicker Jamie Rheem and center Randall Cummins.

Sophomore Aaron Lockett, junior defensive tackle Mario Fatafehi and junior safety Jarrod Cooper all received second-team conference honors. Named as honorable mentions were sophomore offensive lineman Thomas Barnett, sophomore linebacker Ben Leber and junior defensive end Monty Beisel.

In addition to the all-conference picks, Fatafehi was Big 12 Newcomer of the Year and Simoneau was named Defensive Player of the Year. Fatafehi recorded 48 tackles and 3.5 sacks this season. Simoneau led the team in tackles (91), tackles for loss (17), and sacks (6.5) this season.

Simoneau also was named a first-team All American by the Walter Camp Foundation and as well as the Football Writers Association of America. He also is a finalist for the Dick Butkus Award, given annually to the nation's top linebacker, which will be announced Dec. 10 in Orlando, Fla.

Allen, who tied the NCAA record for the most punt returns returned for touchdowns in a career with seven, also is in the running for the Mosi Tatupu Special Teams Award, given to the outstanding special teams player of the season.

Rheem, who made 18 of 21 field goals as well as 41 of 43 extra points this season, was named as a finalist for the Lou Groza Place-kicker Award. Former Wildcat Martin Gramatica received the award in 1997 and was the runner-up in 1998.

The Tatupu and Groza Awards will be announced Dec. 9 on ESPN's College Football Awards Show. Rheem and Allen are expected to be in attendance.

Former Colorado receiver arrested

■ Carruth in custody after incident that left pregnant girlfriend injured.

By PAUL NOWELL
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Rae Carruth of the Carolina Panthers was accused on Wednesday of instigating the drive-by shooting that critically injured his pregnant girlfriend.

"Rae Carruth was the instigator here," Assistant District Attorney Gentry Caudill said. "We are a heartbeat away from a double-murder case."

Carruth, who played college football for the Colorado Buffaloes, faces a $3 million bail that District Court Judge Phil Howerton refused to reduce.

Carruth and two other men are charged in the shooting of Cherica Adams, 24, who was shot four times Nov. 16 while driving in Charlotte.

Doctors delivered a premature son soon after by emergency Caesarean section. Adams and her baby boy remain in critical condition at Carolinas Medical Center.

"She is in very unstable condition," Assistant District Attorney Jack Knight said. "Her condition has worsened."

Defense attorney George Laughrun sought a $100,000 bail for Carruth.

"To this day we don't know what the state of North Carolina alleges Rae Carruth's involvement is in this case," he said. "We don't know the nature of the evidence against him."

The state contends Carruth poses a serious flight risk. But his lawyer said Carruth has strong ties with a job and home in Charlotte. He cited two high-profile murder cases in Charlotte in which bail was much lower.

When Howerton asked prosecutors for reasons to keep the $3 million bail, they said eyewitnesses and direct evidence put Carruth and two other defendants at the scene of the attack.

The state has statements from two of the three defendants, Caudill said. He did not elaborate on which one of the three had not spoken.

Howerton also refused requests to lower the $1.5 million bond for the other defendants, William Edward Watkins, 44, and Michael Eugene Kennedy, 24. Prosecutors had asked the judge to raise their bonds to $3 million apiece.

As he walked off the practice field Wednesday, Panthers coach George Seifert learned that lawyers had described Carruth as playing an integral role in the crime.

"I hope that ultimately it turns out where Rae isn't a part of this, along with hoping that everything turns out well with the victims," Seifert said. "I certainly hope that Rae's not a part of it."

St. Louis Showdown

Men's basketball team squeaks past Billikens with last-second free throws, 69-68

STORY BY SARAH CRAIG

The K-State men's basketball team came back from a 12-point halftime deficit to defeat the St. Louis Billikens 69-68 Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Cats (3-1) were down 67-68 with 20 seconds remaining in the game when senior Josh Reid put up two three-pointers that missed. Senior forward Tony Kitt grabbed the rebound, drawing the foul. Kitt knocked down both free throws for the 69-68 victory.

"I went straight up, I saw the ball and I went straight to the ball," Kitt said. "I didn't really care if they called the foul or not, because we were down one point. It was just a matter of, if I didn't get it, we were going to have to foul, but we were fortunate and I came up with it."

The Billikens (3-2) dominated the first half, led by senior guard Justin Love, who hit four of four three-pointers in the first half and scored 21 points — half the team's 42 first-half points.

The Cats returned to the court after halftime and kept Love to just 10 points. Head coach Tom Asbury said the team struggled to find an answer to Love.

"We knew what we needed to do — we had prepared, we just couldn't do it, we couldn't get him stopped," Asbury said. "We changed guys on him, we tried a bunch of different guys on him in the second half, but sometimes guys get a little tired and … he just had an outstanding game."

Love scored 3 points in the first five minutes of the second half, but the Cats soon found answers to Love's offense. After what Asbury said he considered a questionable call, he yelled at the officials and got a technical foul.

"The combination of the call itself and the technical foul, and I didn't swear at him, really energized us defensively," Asbury said. "We had probably seven or eight solid defensive possessions after that call, and we needed to because that game boiled down to Justin Love and trying to figure out a way to get him stopped."

Kitt led the Cats in scoring with 18 points and rebounding with 10, followed closely by senior guard Cortez Groves with 17 points, 13 in the first half, as well as zero turnovers in 30 minutes of play.

"They took us out of our offense a little bit tonight, and Cortez was kind of the one that kept us in the game the first half," Reid said. "He did a great job at that — we stepped it up and we played like we had to win, like it was our very last game, so it was a great game tonight for our seniors."

Groves said the win taught the team a lesson it can use the rest of the season.

"It's a good win for us," Groves said. "It lets our guys know to never quit, never give up. We were down 12 points at the half. We had a whole second half to play, so just never give up. I just tried to go out there and make something happen for us."

Senior leaders step up in clutch situations.

Forward Tony Kitt did just that as he sank two free throws with just two seconds left to give the Wildcats a 69-68 win over the St. Louis Billikens.

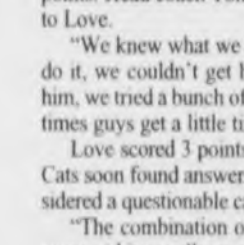
"It felt good to step up and show a little bit of leadership and knock down a couple of free throws when we needed them," Kitt said.

As the 6-foot-8-inch post player stepped to the line, he said the only thing going through his mind was, "We're gonna win."

"I knew I wasn't going to miss those free throws," Kitt said. "I never thought it would've been me to get the chance to do it. I would've taken Josh Reid over me any day. But it so happened that I was the one, and I stepped up and knocked them down."

Kitt said he was more nervous on the first shot than the second but that he was convinced he would win the game for his team.

"I had hit two free throws right before that, and it was just a matter of stepping up to the line and doing it over again," he said. "I knew in the bottom of my heart that I wasn't going to miss those."



Reid said he was confident in having Kitt shoot the clutch free throws, despite the fact that Kitt only averaged 60 percent from the line last season.

"A lot of people might not want Tony on the line, but he's such a winner and he's got such great character that I think he'd be one of my top picks," Reid said. "Being a senior, I told him this was his win tonight — it was all him and he responded."

Sports' symbolism reflects literature, truly proves to be poetry in motion for fans

VIEWPOINT

SARAH CRAIG

What goes on in the minds of athletes generally is beyond the average American's realm of knowledge.

Nobody really knows what Michael Jordan thought just before he put up one of his game winning buzzer shots, and no one really knows what goes through Mark Simoneau's mind when he sacks another quarterback.

The only thing people really do know is that players seem to like it when they do manage the big plays. The reasons for this are nearly self-explanatory: people like to win, people like to score, people like to prove their athletic prowess.

But the reasons for people watching other people do it?

Why?

What is the appeal of watching people, constrained by any number of rules and strange procedures depending on the sport, try to outsmart, outrun and outplay other people?

There are plenty of answers to that question, but few that go beyond a surface answer. Obviously, there are certain aspects of being a sports fan that go with any type of interest — the comradeship that goes with knowing other people that like the same thing, the time it kills on a boring Manhattan evening, the pick-up lines that people can use at bars (okay, maybe that's pushing it, but I once heard someone say to a guy "You look like Mark McGwire. How'd you like to get a home run?").

But even these answers are lacking when one really considers the question at hand. The question is simply what causes some people to stop the remote at ESPN while their roommates would likely just keep flipping channels?

Are sports fanatics just plain crazy?

Surely not, there's far too many for that to be the case. It must be something else.

K-State professor of English Jonathan Holden wrote in his book "Style and Authenticity in Postmodern Poetry" that watching a basketball game is like reading a poem. Don't think about that too long just yet, just think about it like he puts it: both require a suspension of disbelief.

Sports require that the viewer think about the game not in terms of reality but in terms of all those crazy rules and regulations that make a game what it is.

Take basketball, for example. People watching the game know that in reality, these athletes feasibly could continue the game until their death, that the game does not necessarily have to stop and start. In fact, in the reality that most sports viewers know, fouls are negligible if called at all, the score is known by all rather than posted on a nice, big scoreboard, and the game is not timed to the second. We're talking pick up games at the Rec here, compared to NCAA with the shot clock and everything listed that doesn't exist in reality.

Now that it's clear the way sports can be aligned with fiction, perhaps the fascination can be better explained. At a journalism convention in St. Louis, an NFL referee spoke to a group of sportswriters.

He saw his job of blowing the whistle as life and death in terms of maintaining his own integrity.

And he could explain why — every game can symbolize a lifetime in the eyes of a sports fan. Each team has goals, big and small, leading up to the final, lifetime achievement of victory. And every game, someone will try to get in the way. It's up to each athlete to figure out how to get around that, just as in life, it's up to every person to figure out how to get around obstacles that potentially could prevent lifetime achievements.

Is this really why some 50,000 people stand around wearing purple, yelling, clapping and smiling when the K-State football team takes the field?

In one sense, the answer is yes. It goes like this: just as in fiction, there is a storyline to every game, and usually a pretty good one, and people want to see how the plot thickens, twists, turns, climaxes and ends.

In another sense, the answer is no. To those who don't really know the storyline of a game before they watch (I know there's some out there), the fascination is probably a combination of awe and pride. Awe at the outstanding athletic ability of the players on the field, and pride that in a sense, they are ours. They belong to K-State, even if only for a short period of time.

Ah, but what a grand time it is while they're here, isn't it?

And what a grand little story they can weave.

THURSDAY'S health question

Q: What are the symptoms of HIV infection?

A: "When symptoms do develop, they are usually similar at first to those of common minor illnesses, such as the flu, except that they last longer and are more severe. Persistent tiredness, unexplained fevers, recurring night sweats, prolonged enlargement of the lymph nodes and weight loss are all common. Later, there may be persistent diarrhea or sore throat."

Local groups help teach about disease

BY JENNIFER LAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

AIDS Awareness Week, an event meant to raise consciousness about a growing problem, was highlighted Wednesday by the 11th-annual World AIDS Day.

Programs worldwide focused on the education and acceptance of individuals and communities affected by AIDS or HIV. This year's theme was "AIDS — End the Silence, Listen, Learn, Live!"

Locally, programs involving both students and the community were presented in conjunction with the awareness week. On Tuesday, members of STD, HIV and AIDS Peer Educators presented a program at Union Forum Hall. The event was led in part by Reita Currie, a registered nurse at Lafene Health Center who is highly involved with SHAPE and specializes in health education and promotion.

"We wanted to create a program that everyone could feel comfortable attending, both students and the community," Currie said. "It's important to educate about AIDS, because the only real cure for AIDS is prevention."

The Regional AIDS Project sponsored an event at the Wareham Opera House on Wednesday, celebrating the lives of AIDS victims. Eunice Dorst, executive director of the Regional AIDS Center, helped create a program aimed for people of all ages. A children's choir, personal testimonies and a candlelight vigil are only some of the events at the Wareham. The Regional AIDS Center is a nonprofit organization dedicated to providing education and prevention of AIDS in the region. It also specializes in case management and client services.

Dorst said that since 1981, there have been just fewer than 30,000 AIDS cases reported in Kansas. In July, the federal government announced that real names must be given to receive extended medical help, which eliminates the use of false names to protect identity.

"It will take a couple of years before the real numbers come in, and when they do, I think it is going to be a real shock to those who think AIDS aren't near them," Dorst said.

Although specific statistics are not released, general information is provided about regions in Kansas. The region to which Riley County belongs, which also includes Washington, Marshall, Pottawatomie, Clay and Geary counties, is eighth in the nine regions for number of cases of HIV reported since 1981. Only 69 people have been listed as having AIDS.

Both Currie and Dorst said people should not trust these statistics completely. First of all, the statistics represent the number of those who were tested in their area, which could mean that a few of the 69 people do not actually live in that area. Instead, the statistics could represent only where the victim was tested.

Although HIV might seem distant to Kansas residents, it is a virus that does not discriminate and is prevalent everywhere, Currie said.

Amy Mauk, junior in family studies/human services and social work and current president of SHAPE, said she enjoys working with the group.

"I saw the group as a great way to get awareness and education out there," Mauk said. "I've learned students are more apt to listen to their peers."

Putting on different shows adapted to each audiences' needs is a large part of what SHAPE does, Mauk said. The group's shows can be filled with different parts, including humorous or dramatic skits, question-and-answer periods, presentations — such as how to put on a condom — or just sharing facts. The presentations can be short and to the point or more in-depth, Mauk said.

Mauk said the best way to sum up why SHAPE is important is the fact that even though not everyone is infected, everyone is affected by AIDS.

Mauk said SHAPE is seeking new members. Students interested in becoming involved can pick up an application at Lafene or can contact Currie at 532-6627. The deadline for these applications is Friday.

Students and community members interested in participating in AIDS Awareness Week also can make plans to visit Frankfurt, Kan., where a display of three panels of the AIDS Memorial Quilt will be presented at the Cigna Center, 402 N. Maple St. The display, which was initiated in part by the Teen Hope group from Frankfurt High School, will run through Sunday.

HIV/AIDS QUIZ

How much do you know about HIV/AIDS?

1. T or F: AIDS is a disease without a cure spread mainly by unprotected sex or sharing needles with someone who has HIV.

2. If you were infected with HIV, you might show symptoms ...
   A. within a few weeks.
   B. within a year.
   C. in 10 or more years.
   D. any of the above.

3. T or F: New HIV/AIDS drug treatments have lowered the number of AIDS-related deaths in the United States.

4. T or F: If you are HIV-positive and pregnant, there are medicines you can take that greatly decrease the chances of your baby having HIV.

5. HIV is not present in ...
   A. semen and vaginal secretions.
   B. sweat.
   C. blood.
   D. breast milk.

6. T or F: Only drug users and gay men need to worry about becoming infected with HIV.

7. You can become infected with HIV by ...
   A. drinking from the same cup as someone with HIV.
   B. mosquito bites.
   C. hugging someone with HIV.
   D. none of the above.

8. T or F: Using protection such as a latex barrier when having sex (vaginal, oral or anal) lowers the risk of HIV transmission.

9. T or F: Women will not get HIV if they use birth-control pills and/or a diaphragm.

10. How many people worldwide are newly infected with HIV each day?
    A. less than 500
    B. 1,000
    C. more than 5,000
    D. More than 15,000

product of their culture."

A product of the United State's culture is the ability to change when necessary, he said.

"Democracy is an ongoing moral experiment in a people's capacity to govern themselves," Hyde said.

He cited the Founding Fathers as men who staked all they held dear in order to try a democratic system. However, today, and as people look to the future, the system is in the people's hands.

"In the quest for peace, freedom and order in the world, America will have to bear a burden of responsibility into the future," he said. "In the 21st century, a great possibility and equivalent danger, the character of the American people will be tested as never before."

Hyde concluded by clarifying America's direction and reiterating the connection between culture and politics.

"Character is destiny and has been since the Bible," he said. "The character of our people, of those who lead them and those who interpret pubic affairs for them, is the foundation of American democracy."

division champion not advancing to the Bowl Championship Series," Max Urick, K-State athletic director, said.

K-State, which will make its seventh consecutive bowl appearance, made its first visit to the Holiday Bowl in 1995, when it defeated the Colorado State Rams 54-21.

"The Culligan Holiday Bowl is a high-quality bowl, and our fans and team had a great time in San Diego in 1995," Urick said. "The potential matchup with the Pac-10's second-place team in Washington also is very intriguing."

K-State will receive an allotment of 11,500 tickets for the Holiday Bowl. Ticket orders will be taken beginning at noon today through the K-State Athletics Ticket Office. All tickets will be $40.

The contest is scheduled for a 7 p.m. kickoff at Qualcomm Stadium and will be televised nationally by ESPN.

"Dawn has left her stamp on the team," McLaughlin said. "I was hoping she would get the player of the year award, but then again, I'm biased."

Regardless of how the team does in the tournament, its success this year is a sign of good things to come.

"We felt that if we had a good team this year we would be a great team on down the road," McLaughlin said.

Scientists reach genetic milestone

By JEFF DONN
The Associated Press

For the first time, scientists have mapped virtually an entire human chromosome, one of the chains of molecules that bear the genetic recipe for human life.

The achievement, announced Wednesday, is an important step for the $3 billion Human Genome Project, which is attempting to detail the tens of thousands of genes that carry instructions for everything in a human — from brain function to hair color to foot size.

"This is the first time that we've had a complete chapter in the human instruction book, and that's pretty amazing," said Francis Collins, who chairs the international project from the National Institutes of Health.

"I think this is probably the most important scientific effort that mankind has ever mounted. That includes splitting the atom and going to the moon," he said.

In laying out the chemical instructions for life, scientists believe they are in the early stages of revolutionizing the study of human development and medicine.

Already, researchers have begun testing several biological therapies that replace faulty genes or correct their misfirings to make cells work correctly. Such therapies, if they can be made reliable, would bring a more precise way to treat diseases without the sometimes debilitating side effects of conventional drugs.

A draft of the entire genome was expected to be done next spring, but the milestone announced Wednesday may hasten its completion. The study's details appear in the journal Nature.

The human genetic pattern, or genome, is a biological map laying out the sequence of 3 billion pairs of chemicals that make up the DNA in each cell. All human DNA is contained within 23 pairs of chromosomes.

What the scientists have done is lay out the order of about 545 of the estimated 700 genes on chromosome 22, which has about 1.1 percent of the genes in the human body.

About 55 percent of the genes were new to researchers during the study; 45 percent already had been discovered during the Human Genome Project.

The chromosome 22 group, which includes British, American, Japanese, Canadian and Swedish scientists, could find only 97 percent of the chromosome's genetic material.

After WTO session disrupted, Clinton vows to seek trade consensus

By GEORGE TIBBITS
The Associated Press

SEATTLE — Stunned by violent street protests resulting in scores of arrests, delegates to a 135-nation trade gathering insisted they would push ahead today with efforts to launch a new round of talks. President Clinton pledged to work for a "broader consensus" to meet the protesters' concerns.

After touring a state-of-the-art port facility for processing Washington state apples, Clinton told an audience of farmers he welcomed the thousands of protesters who had come to Seattle to peacefully voice their concerns about how the World Trade Organization operates.

But, he said, "for those who came here to break windows or hurt small businesses or stop people from going to meetings ... I condemn them."

Clinton gave a strong defense of the objectives of the WTO meetings this week to launch a new round of global trade negotiations.

He said tearing down global trade barriers built against American farm products, manufactured goods and service companies would make sure the U.S. economy remained strong and prosperous in the 21st century.

"We have to continue to open markets ... but we can't do any of that unless there is a broader consensus on trade," Clinton said.

Clinton's motorcade to the Seattle port traveled through a trashed downtown where officials were stepping up arrests of protesters to regain control of the streets after imposing an overnight curfew.

Washington Gov. Gary Locke ordered as many as 200 members of the National Guard and 300 state troopers to the city, where they will serve as backup to police who battled rampaging protesters with tear gas and pepper spray Tuesday.

Wednesday, city officials declared a no-protest zone for nearly all of the city's downtown core, about 50 city blocks, acknowledging they were caught unaware by the magnitude of the disturbance.

"Clearly, in hindsight, the approach we used yesterday did not work and we're going to have to take a different approach today," Assistant Police Chief Ed Joiner told a news conference.

Police, who arrested 68 people Tuesday, moved in swiftly wednesday morning to break up pockets of demonstrators and arrested about 250 of them, bringing in transit buses to take them away. Most of the protesters were nonviolent, going limp as police tried to pick them up.

"This conference will be a success. The issues are far too important to be ignored," said Mike Moore, director general of the World Trade Organization.

Police chief Norm Stamper told a news conference: "The downtown area needs to be and will in fact be made safe today for everyone."

Mayor Paul Schell, interviewed on NBC's "Today," said, "I think we've secured the town."

He said Guard troops will "be used primarily for backup. They are not armed. I don't want armed personnel in the streets. I think that might even be more provocative."

WTO delegates long had expected protests, but nothing like the storm that hit Seattle when at least 40,000 activists took to the streets on the day the conference was to open. Some 5,000 protesters confronted police, with a handful launching an assault on the downtown business area.

World AIDS Day focuses on orphaned children

By ANDREW SELSKY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — While AIDS activists handed out condoms in city buses in Bangkok and dropped them from a helicopter in Pretoria, much of the attention of World AIDS Day on Wednesday focused on the children — 11 million of whom have lost their parents.

"I have no idea of what my father looked like, what his voice or footsteps sounded like," Andrew Jackson Okrut of Uganda told a U.N. symposium in New York.

In a report released Wednesday, U.N. officials estimated that 11 million children already have been orphaned by the pandemic and that the number will reach 13 million by the end of next year.

"Things will get worse before they get better," said Dr. Peter Piot, executive director of UNAIDS.

It is almost unfathomable to think things could get worse in sub-Saharan Africa, home to 95 percent of AIDS orphans.

Eastern and southern Africa account for only 4.8 percent of the world's population yet comprise more than 50 percent of the 33.6 million people infected with the virus that causes AIDS. The regions account for 60 percent of AIDS deaths, U.N. data shows.

In Nigeria, HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, is estimated to infect a new person every minute. By 2003, an estimated 4.9 million Nigerians aged 15-49 are expected to be infected with HIV, compared to about 2.6 million today, according to a Nigerian report released Wednesday.

In China, taboos were being broken as the government launched an AIDS-awareness campaign. The country's news media, which is government controlled, is trying for the first time to initiate public discussions about sex and sexually tranmitted diseases.

With an estimated 1,700 Zimbabweans dying of AIDS every week, President Robert Mugabe has pushed a 4-percent "AIDS levy" on personal income and corporate taxes that takes effect Jan. 1.

"This is a disaster devastating our society," Mugabe said Wednesday. "We have to assist the many orphans who have been left behind."

Dr. Luc Montagnier, the French co-discoverer of HIV, warned in Paris that an effective AIDS vaccine could be 30 years away unless governments encourage wider research.

From Europe to Asia, activists used sometimes serious and sometimes silly methods to attract attention to the fight against AIDS.

In South Africa, where an estimated 4 million people have HIV, a police helicopter dropped thousands of foil-wrapped condoms on a crowd in Pretoria's main square.

Some South Africans brushed aside the stigma associated with AIDS and went on national radio to say they were infected and to beseech others to practice abstinence or safe sex.

Bulgarian Red Cross workers dressed in condom costumes handed out prophylactics to passers-by in the town of Varna.

In Bangkok, Thailand, a person dressed as a bright orange condom with a smiley face passed out free condoms to passengers on a city bus.

Widows and AIDS patients in the Cambodian capital made impassioned pleas for men to stop patronizing brothels and to start using condoms. Cambodia, with an estimated 200,000 people believed infected with HIV, has the highest reported infection rate in Asia.

In China, taboos were being broken as the government launched an AIDS-awareness campaign.

The country's news media, which is government controlled, is trying for the first time to initiate public discussions about sex and sexually transmitted diseases.

The first-ever condom advertisement appeared on Chinese television Sunday. The commercial ends with a catchy rhyme in Mandarin Chinese: "Condoms, no troubles."

There's urgency in the move. While the number of infected people is relatively low, experts warn the world's most populous country might be devastated by AIDS in the next century.

The World Parliament of Religions opened an eight-day conference in Cape Town by calling attention to the global AIDS fight. An AIDS memorial quilt bearing the names of 1,000 victims of the disease was unfurled in a park.

"We wanted to make a clear gesture to say AIDS is a terrible problem throughout the world," said Jim Kenney, the organization's chairman.

Meanwhile, South African National Assembly Speaker Frene Ginwala unveiled a giant red ribbon draped across the entrance to Parliament.

If the spread of AIDS is not contained, South Africa's hopes for progress in the post-apartheid era will be dashed, she said.

"We will not only be stalled in our efforts to progress, we will also move backwards as time goes on," she said.

Speaking in Paris, William Magkoba of South Africa's Medical Research Council appealed for optimism.

"Europe was once in turmoil because of the Black Death, but that was followed by the European Renaissance," he said. "Some of us compare that period with the one now in Africa. We must be positive."

Japanese education system faces questions after mother arrested for murder of 2-year-old

By JOSEPH COLEMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOKYO — The Japanese way of education often means unrelenting pressure on families, biting competition between children and fiery jealousy among parents.

But could it also mean murder?

The Japanese have been asking that question since a housewife was arrested last week in the slaying of a 2-year-old girl — and the media linked the crime to entrance exams for elite kindergartens.

Details remain fuzzy, and reports emerged Tuesday that the 35-year-old suspect, who turned herself in to police, has denied she acted out of jealousy over the child's academic success.

Whatever the motive, the crime has ignited a wide-ranging debate over Japan's cutthroat education practices.

The story has been splashed across newspapers and TV talk shows for days. The government has promised to consider education reforms. Critics are using it as fodder for tirades against schools and society.

"People have this illusion that if you go to a good school, a happy life is waiting for you," said Gentaro Kawakami, a sociologist and education specialist. "In Japan these days, we are raising children as if we were training animals."

At the center of the case is Mitsuko Yamada, who is accused of taking Haruna Wakayama from a nursery school playground in central Tokyo and strangling her with a scarf in a public bathroom.

She then allegedly buried the child's body at her parents' house, 110 miles away.

Police will only say that Yamada, who was taken into custody Nov. 25, had clashes with the victim's mother. Both women had two children the same ages, 2 and 5.

Police arrest 9 members of fraternity

■ Stolen tree leads officer to arrest pledges of Beta Sigma Psi Thursday.

By LAUREN BEATTY and JOSEPH HURLA
Kansas State Collegian

Nine members of Beta Sigma Psi fraternity were arrested at 3:55 a.m. Thursday morning for felony theft of an 11-foot Colorado Blue Spruce tree.

Officer Tim Schuck of the Riley County Police Department was patrolling the area of Ivy Drive when he spotted a black pickup truck carrying the large tree and nine men — five men in the cargo area and four in the cab.

The officer pulled the truck over in a routine traffic stop. The men admitted to cutting down and stealing the tree from the front yard of 1936 Bluestem Terrace.

Beta Sigma Psi president Aaron Ricker said the nine fraternity members were pledges. He also said the pledges were not told by any other members of the fraternity to procure a tree.

"In the past few years, we've always had a guy in our house — who owned a lot — who always donated a tree to us," Ricker said. "We were just going to go without a tree this year, but these members of our house took it upon themselves to go get a tree without our knowledge."

Former student to plea to charge of manslaughter

■ Trial date to be set Monday for man also charged with drug-related crimes.

By LAUREN BEATTY
Kansas State Collegian

The official trial date for a local man charged with voluntary manslaughter will be set Monday after Richard Jones, 25, enters his plea. Jones is scheduled to enter his plea at 9 a.m.

A preliminary hearing took place Tuesday and Wednesday at the Riley County Courthouse to show probable cause that Jones committed these crimes, which left a Junction City man dead.

Jones, a former K-State student, also is charged with criminal solicitation to commit first-degree murder, as well as several drug-related charges, including sale of, conspiracy to distribute and possession of marijuana within 1,000 feet of a school, said Brenda Jordan, assistant Riley County attorney.

The victim, Stephen Waters, was killed last January when he and two other Junction City residents broke into Jones' home.

Jones was freed on a reduced bond of $50,000. In March, he was arrested again on the drug charges, a violation of his release. Officials said the drug charges are related to the motive for the murder.

If found guilty, Jones faces a maximum of 24 years in prison.

Admissions Office hires new associate director

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State Admissions Office has hired a new associate director of undergraduate admissions.

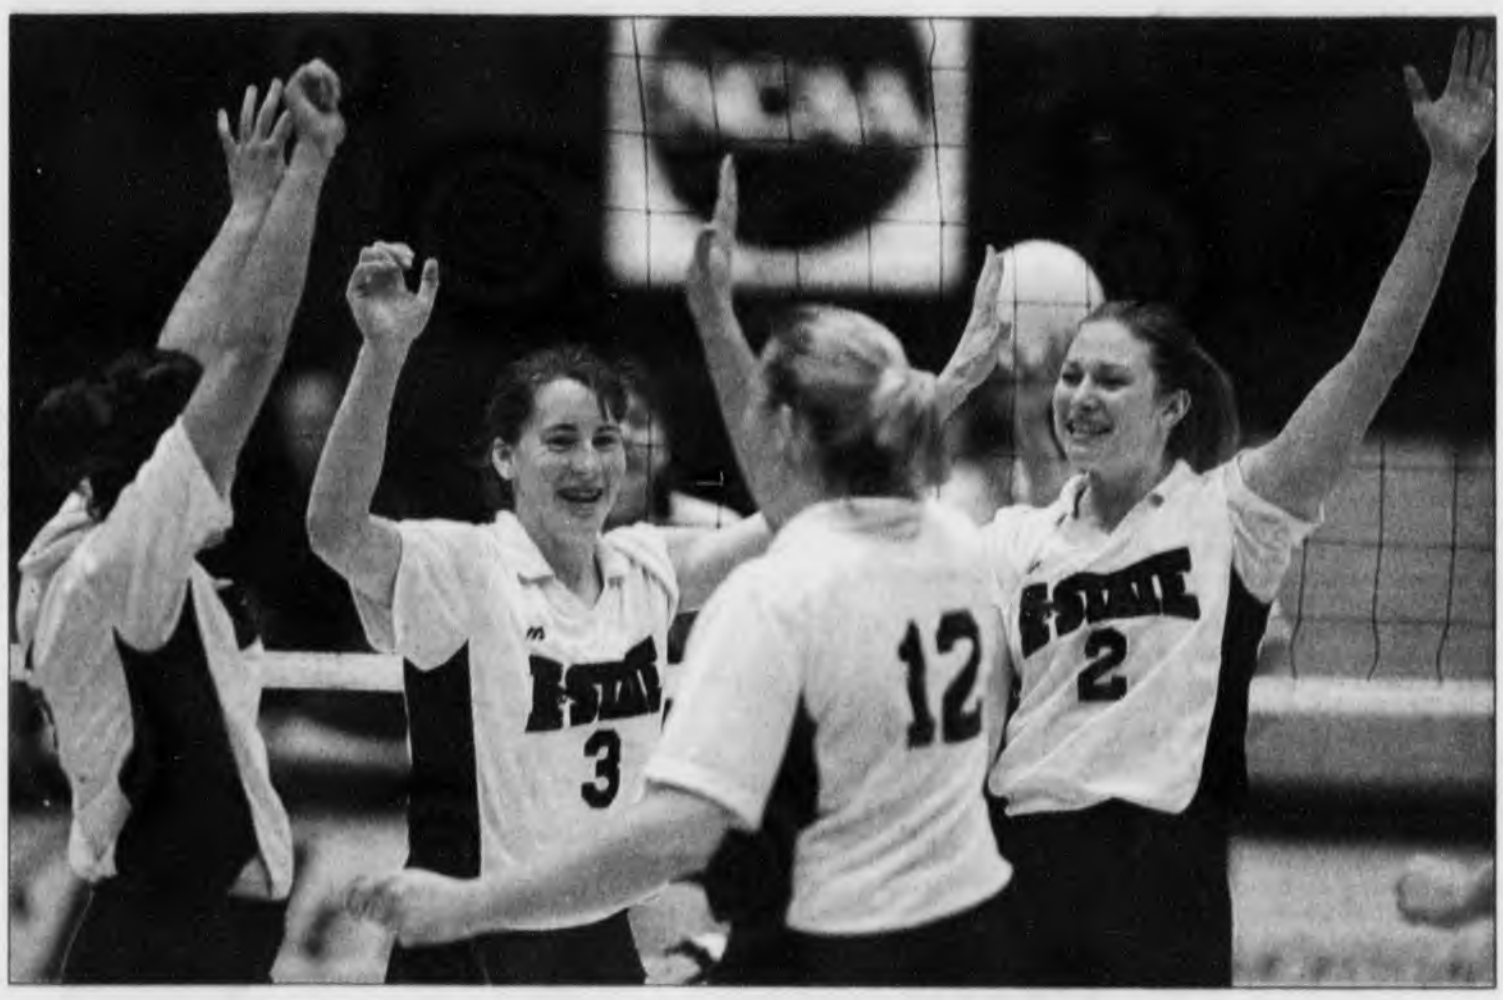
Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance, said Christine Crenshaw was hired due to the retirement of Barbara Dawes from the position in September.

"We had began a nationwide search for someone to fill the position," Moeder said. "Christine was one of the applicants, and she was then hired for the job."

Crenshaw formerly was employed by the Kansas Board of Regents and decided to take the job because she was in a position to change jobs.

"I was fortunate that Dawes retired when I was in a position to apply for the job," Crenshaw said.

Crenshaw will begin work at K-State on Jan. 18, 2000, and said she will be taking on new responsibilities with her job as associate director but has a career commitment to working with student admissions.



"That is what my expertise is in," Crenshaw said. "The job I am taking on at K-State is similar to my job at the Board of Regents, but at K-State I am going to be focusing more on student service."

Crenshaw had filed a grievance about the regents earlier this year, alleging that she was paid as much as $20,000 less than a male employee in a similar job.

The regents were going to settle the grievance through mediation but are now focusing on responding to the grievance with a study that will conclude in January.

Crenshaw said she loved what she did for the regents but saw the job switch as necessary.

"I love what I do," Crenshaw said. "I am just in a position to take on the new job."

FORT COLLINS, Colo. — It was a clean sweep for the No. 19 K-State volleyball team Thursday night.

The Wildcats (21-8) swept Louisville (19-12) in three games, 15-1, 15-6 and 15-10, in the first round of the Mountain Regional in the 1999 NCAA Volleyball Tournament at Moby Arena.

With the win, the Cats will move on to play the Colorado State Rams at 7 tonight.

"We wanted to get on their tendencies," head coach Jim McLaughlin said. "We studied this team, and we felt like we knew them well. It was going to be a matter of us staying on task all night long."

K-State's 9-0 run to open game one led to complete domination, posting 13 kills and recording just one error, for a .571 hitting percentage in the 15-1 victory.

Thirteen forced errors by K-State led to the 15-6 loss in game two for Louisville.

Game three started the same way as game one. K-State rolled to a 10-4 lead early, but Louisville fought back to score 5 of the next 7 points to pull within three at 12-9. It eventually was beaten 15-10 to seal the Cats' match win.

"I think we played OK," McLaughlin said. "The only thing is that I think we maybe trailed off a little bit in the third game. The defensive and offensive transition was not as smooth as we would have liked it to be."

Leading the way for K-State was senior outside hitter Dawn Cady with 17 kills and 13 digs. Sophomore outside hitter Liz Wegner chipped in with 14 kills and nine digs.

Louisville head coach Leonid Yelin said it just was beaten by a better team.

"We weren't able to put the ball in the floor in the first two games," Yelin said. "Kansas State took full advantage. Basically, we got beat by a better team tonight.

"They knocked us completely out of our system. There is no other way of putting it."

Freshman Sonja Percan led Louisville with 10 kills, but committed eight errors on the night, finishing with a .061 hitting percentage.

The Cats will have to contend with a tough home crowd when they meet up with the Rams tonight, but sophomore setter Disney Bronnenberg said she doesn't anticipate any problems with it.

"As long as we stay together out there on the court, I don't think it really matters," said Bronnenberg, who recorded 37 assists against Louisville.

K-State forensics team earns No. 2 national ranking

■ Team continues dominance due to variety of supporters.

By KELLY EVENSON
Kansas State Collegian

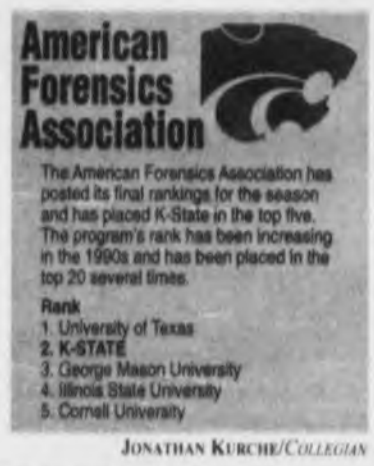
The American Forensics Association recently has announced that the K-State forensics program is No. 2 in the nation.

Forensics is a broad category that forms competitive speech. It includes both debate and individual events, or the speech squad.

John Burtis, director of forensics and associate professor of speech communications, said the ranking is based upon the performance of both the individual events and debate team at the two national competitions in April.

He said the number of wins and losses are calculated for each team, and the number of students who place in the top three also factors into the national ranking. This year, the University of Texas claimed the No. 1 spot, with George Mason University, Illinois State University and Cornell University rounding out the top five.

"It's a combination of outstanding coaches who have good experience in speech communication, combined with the good support we have been given over the past few years," Burtis said.



Burtis said the forensics squad has received support from several sources — Student Governing Association; KSU Foundation; the College of Arts and Sciences; the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance; and President Jon Wefald.

He said outside support has allowed the team to travel to tournaments and compete competitively on a national level.

Craig Brown, director of individual events, said the program has improved steadily and finished in the top 20 during the 1990s because of the university's financial backing and Wefald's support.

"The big thing for us is that our talent doesn't lie within any one class," Brown said. "We just keep reloading instead of rebuilding."

Burtis said one of the reasons for the large amount of talent in the forensics program at K-State is the students who come from programs in Kansas.

Jonathan Kurche/Collegian

"Almost all of our students come from the state of Kansas," Burtis said. "There is a long tradition of great high school forensics teams in the state, and the competitors show it."

Wefald said he has given support to the squad because he wants K-State to be known as a good university in a variety of areas, not just athletics. He also said forensics at K-State has many strong supporters because of its dominance in the 1990s.

"We want K-State to be known as a university that produces countless scholars year in and year out," Wefald said. "Any time a team of ours places second out of hundreds, you have to be pleased.

"Everyone knows how we feel when one of our athletic teams is in the top 10, so we should be just as thrilled for one of our programs that finishes second in the United States."

Brown said that in order to prepare for a tournament, the team begins by figuring out who will take what event, getting material ready and then spending a lot of time on perfecting speeches.

He said it is more a case of costly perfection and making things a little better at this time of the year than working on new material. The speech team's final tournament of the semester will be this weekend at Nebraska Wesleyan University.

Senate approves resolutions to offer Fine Arts Council guidelines on allocations process

■ Group also passes increase in privilege fee for KSDB-FM.

By LAUREN BEATTY
Kansas State Collegian

The issue of the Fine Arts Council restructuring has come to rest.

Student Senate voted unanimously Thursday night to approve resolutions that offered the council guidelines on their allocations process.

"After a little push and shove, the Fine Arts Council has agreed to make these changes themselves," Senate Operations Chair Dustin Petrik said.

"It is our recommendation that Senate pass these resolutions and move on to other business," Petrik said.

The changes in the resolution would revert any unspent funds by fine arts organizations to the privilege fee reserve account, instead of the Fine Arts Council reserve account. Also, unspent funds that are more than 15 percent of fine arts departments' yearly allocations will revert to the privilege fee reserve account.

Another resolution on council membership was approved by a voice vote. This resolution approves of the council's increase of the number of voting members from 17 to 19, said Ted Conrad, business senator and council chairman. It also approved of the elimination of faculty voting on the spending of students' fees by the council. Conrad said the council plans on adding more appointed members, as opposed to elected members. Four students-at-large, appointed by the student body president, will have a seat on the council, as well as three senators. Faculty members on the council will serve to give advice on allocations, but will have no vote.

Senate voted 48-0-2 to increase the privilege fee for the KSDB-FM 91.9 radio station. Privilege Fee Chair Ryan Walker said the increase will be used for equipment and the station manager's salary. Student fees will not be increased, Walker said.

KSDB will receive a 7.4-percent increase in fees, from $42,676 to $45,869. $2,500 of the money will be for the equipment, and $693 will be used for the manager's salary.

"They requested a little more, but we wanted them to take some ownership in the equipment," Walker said.

Two campus organizations received allocations. The KSU 1/4 Scale Tractor Club made a request of $5,000 for a new trailer. Senate approved the allocation 47-0. The Newman Club made a request of $3,049 but will receive only $1,375 to travel to Washington, D.C., to work with the homeless.

Senate will meet next on Jan. 20, 2000.

School in Kansas evacuated after pepper-spray incident

OVERLAND PARK, Kan. — Someone ran down a high school hallway discharging pepper spray Thursday, forcing the evacuation of the school and sending 12 students to the hospital.

A total of 19 students complained of nausea, asthma attacks, or eye irritation, police said.

Blue Valley Northwest High School was evacuated for 15 minutes, and classes later were canceled. About 1,500 students attend the school.

The unidentified person emptied a small canister of pepper spray, then threw it in a trash can, police Sgt. Tom Fredrickson said. No one has been arrested.

Controversial film's release in Topeka theaters delayed

TOPEKA — The movie "Dogma," seen by many Catholics as an attack on their church, might not play in the capital city.

Members of St. Joseph's Catholic Church had planned to protest the movie at its Topeka opening, which they expected this weekend. However, they learned that the film isn't coming and canceled their plans.

"We've been successful as far as stopping it from coming for now," church member Jan Dohrman told the Topeka Capital-Journal.

Hal McClure, a film buyer for Wallace Theatres in Portland, Ore., which owns Topeka's three movie theaters, insisted that the film's critics have not prevailed.

However, McClure was reluctant to discuss his plans for "Dogma," saying he will decide "sometime in my lifetime" whether it will come to Topeka.

"The movie may come to Topeka, and it may not," he said.

In "Dogma," two exiled angels find a loophole in Catholic Church dogma that will allow them to return to heaven. The problem is that if they succeed, they will prove God is fallible and eradicate the whole of existence.

It was released Nov. 12 across the nation, including theaters in Lawrence and Manhattan.

About 130 people in Lawrence and 120 people in Manhattan protested the opening night of the movie.

The U.S. Catholic Conference classified "Dogma" as morally offensive for its "anti-religious buffoonery, intense violence, sexual references, substance abuse, assorted vulgarities, profanity and recurring rough language."

Dohrman described the movie as blasphemous and "very anti-Catholic," adding that it "mocks God, the church's teachings, Mary's virginity and the Mass." He said he "put on the armor of God" to read the script on the Internet.

"They're attacking God, and they're attacking the church," he said.

John Tibbetts, an assistant professor of film at the University of Kansas, said the controversy surrounding "Dogma" probably has brought it unwarranted attention.

"If it hadn't been for all the hype, I would have just regarded it as a second-rate film," he said.

Not all reviewers agree with Tibbetts. For example, Entertainment Weekly magazine described the film as "deliriously audacious," adding, "yet it's also a searching meditation on faith in our time."

Bailiff fired for leaving boy in his cell during weekend

INDIANAPOLIS — A 13-year-old boy spent the weekend unattended in a courthouse cell after a bailiff forgot to check the cell before going home.

After a court hearing Saturday, Aaron Robinson was locked in the Juvenile Court holding cell with no food, water or toilet facilities. He was discovered Monday morning.

The bailiff, a 10-year employee of the court, was fired.

Robinson had been arrested and taken to the court building Friday night after his mother told police he had stolen her car.

The boy was released after a hearing but feared punishment from his parents and did not want to return home, Superior Court Judge James Payne said. So he was taken to a holding cell and was to have been transferred to a detention center on another floor Saturday evening.

"Aaron has not been able to really sleep. I just keep replaying this in my mind: My child beating on the door and no one able to hear his pleas for help. There could have been a fire, or he could have had a panic attack," his mother, Pearlinea Robinson, said.

K-State jazz musician performs in honor of king of Thailand

BY NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One of K-State's distinguished musicians has traveled worldwide to perform with the Carnegie Hall Jazz Band.

Dennis Wilson, assistant dean of arts and sciences, left Oct. 24 for Bangkok, Thailand. Wilson, along with 16 other band members, performed in honor of His Majesty King Bhumibol Adulyadej's 72nd birthday. The band's two concerts were titled "A Tribute to a Great King."

"It was a good experience," Wilson said. "It was definitely unique."

The first concert was open to the public. Wilson said the audience consisted mainly of teachers because the band is an American organization and the teachers are intrigued with American culture.

The evening began with Miss Thailand introducing the band.

"You have to be introduced to the audience in their language," Wilson said. "We all enjoyed it, especially the guys, the ones who weren't married, getting to be introduced by Miss Thailand."

He said the king is a big fan of jazz and has composed many songs.

"The king likes music, and he likes jazz," Wilson said. "What got me is we played one of the king's songs, and the audience went crazy. The people there know the king's music, and they love the king. Not one person had anything bad to say about the king."

Jon Faddis, music director of the Carnegie Hall Jazz Band, said he was also surprised by the public's response.

"I thought both nights would be quiet and polite," Faddis said. "So, it was kind of nice to have the first one under the belt, having them be so energetic."

Faddis said the band had put together an arrangement of the king's compositions for the occasion, and only the best nine of the 17 band members were selected to perform.

"That was pretty fun, playing the king's arrangements," he said.

The group's second performance was open only to political people, heads of state and ambassadors. Though the concert was in honor and celebration of the king's birthday, he could not attend because of his prestige.

The queen, Her Majesty Mom Rajawongse Sirikit, was supposed to represent the king at the concert along with Gen. Prem Tinsulanonda, president of the Privy Council, who had been appointed by the king to attend.

"The king can't come to something that small. He's like a god," Wilson said. "We knew the king would not be at the concert, because he could not leave the palace for something like that, so he invited us to his palace."

The night of the concert, the band was informed that the king had fallen ill to the flu and would not be able to meet the band members as planned. The queen then could not attend the concert because she stayed with the king while he was ill.

"That was disappointing," Wilson said. "We were looking forward to meeting the king, and we even stayed another day just to meet him."

Faddis said he wasn't surprised and that the last time he was to perform for the queen, the same scenario happened. The king became ill, and the queen missed the performance to be with him.

Because the king was not able to meet the band, he personally invited the members to tour his old palace.

"It was huge, with loads of gold. They found some way of turning an ounce of gold into paint," Wilson said. "The buildings sparkled."

Faddis said the trip was enjoyable but fatiguing.

"Playing with the Carnegie Hall Jazz Band always gives me a special joy," Faddis said. "It was a fun trip for everyone, but really tiring. It's a long way to go for two concerts."

After returning from Bangkok, the band received a two-day break. While most of the band remained in New York, Wilson left for Kansas to teach his music students.

Two days after arriving home in Manhattan, he left again for another tour with the Carnegie Hall Jazz Band.

"This was not an easy tour," Wilson said. "You don't really get to settle down, playing six concerts in seven days."

The band toured the West Coast, playing at various colleges and concert halls.

"It was not a fun trip," Wilson said. "We're not going there and laying on the beaches in Santa Barbara. Sometimes these trips are more of a pain than anything."

Faddis said it was quite a different program than the one they performed in Thailand. They performed the music of Louis Armstrong and Duke Ellington, which Faddis said was difficult and rare music to perform.

Three hours after their last performance, Wilson got on a plane and headed back to Kansas. Despite his luggage getting lost and his trombone getting dented, he said he was happy to be back in Manhattan.

He said that even though traveling can be hard, he is glad to be able to contribute anything he can to K-State, its students and the city of Manhattan.

"I like to share what I can do," Wilson said. "If what I do can help students or K-State, then I'm happy to do it."

Dennis Wilson conducts the KSU Jazz Repertory Ensemble in Forum Hall last April. The ensemble is composed of instruments that are not typically thought of as jazz instruments, such as the bassoon and violin.

Restaurant construction under way

BY TIM RICHARDSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new restaurant will return to Manhattan early next year after leaving the city nearly two years ago.

Country Kitchen will open its new location near Manhattan Town Center. Ann Carlson, director of marketing for Restaurant Concepts in Kearney, Neb., said the restaurant will feature a new menu and design.

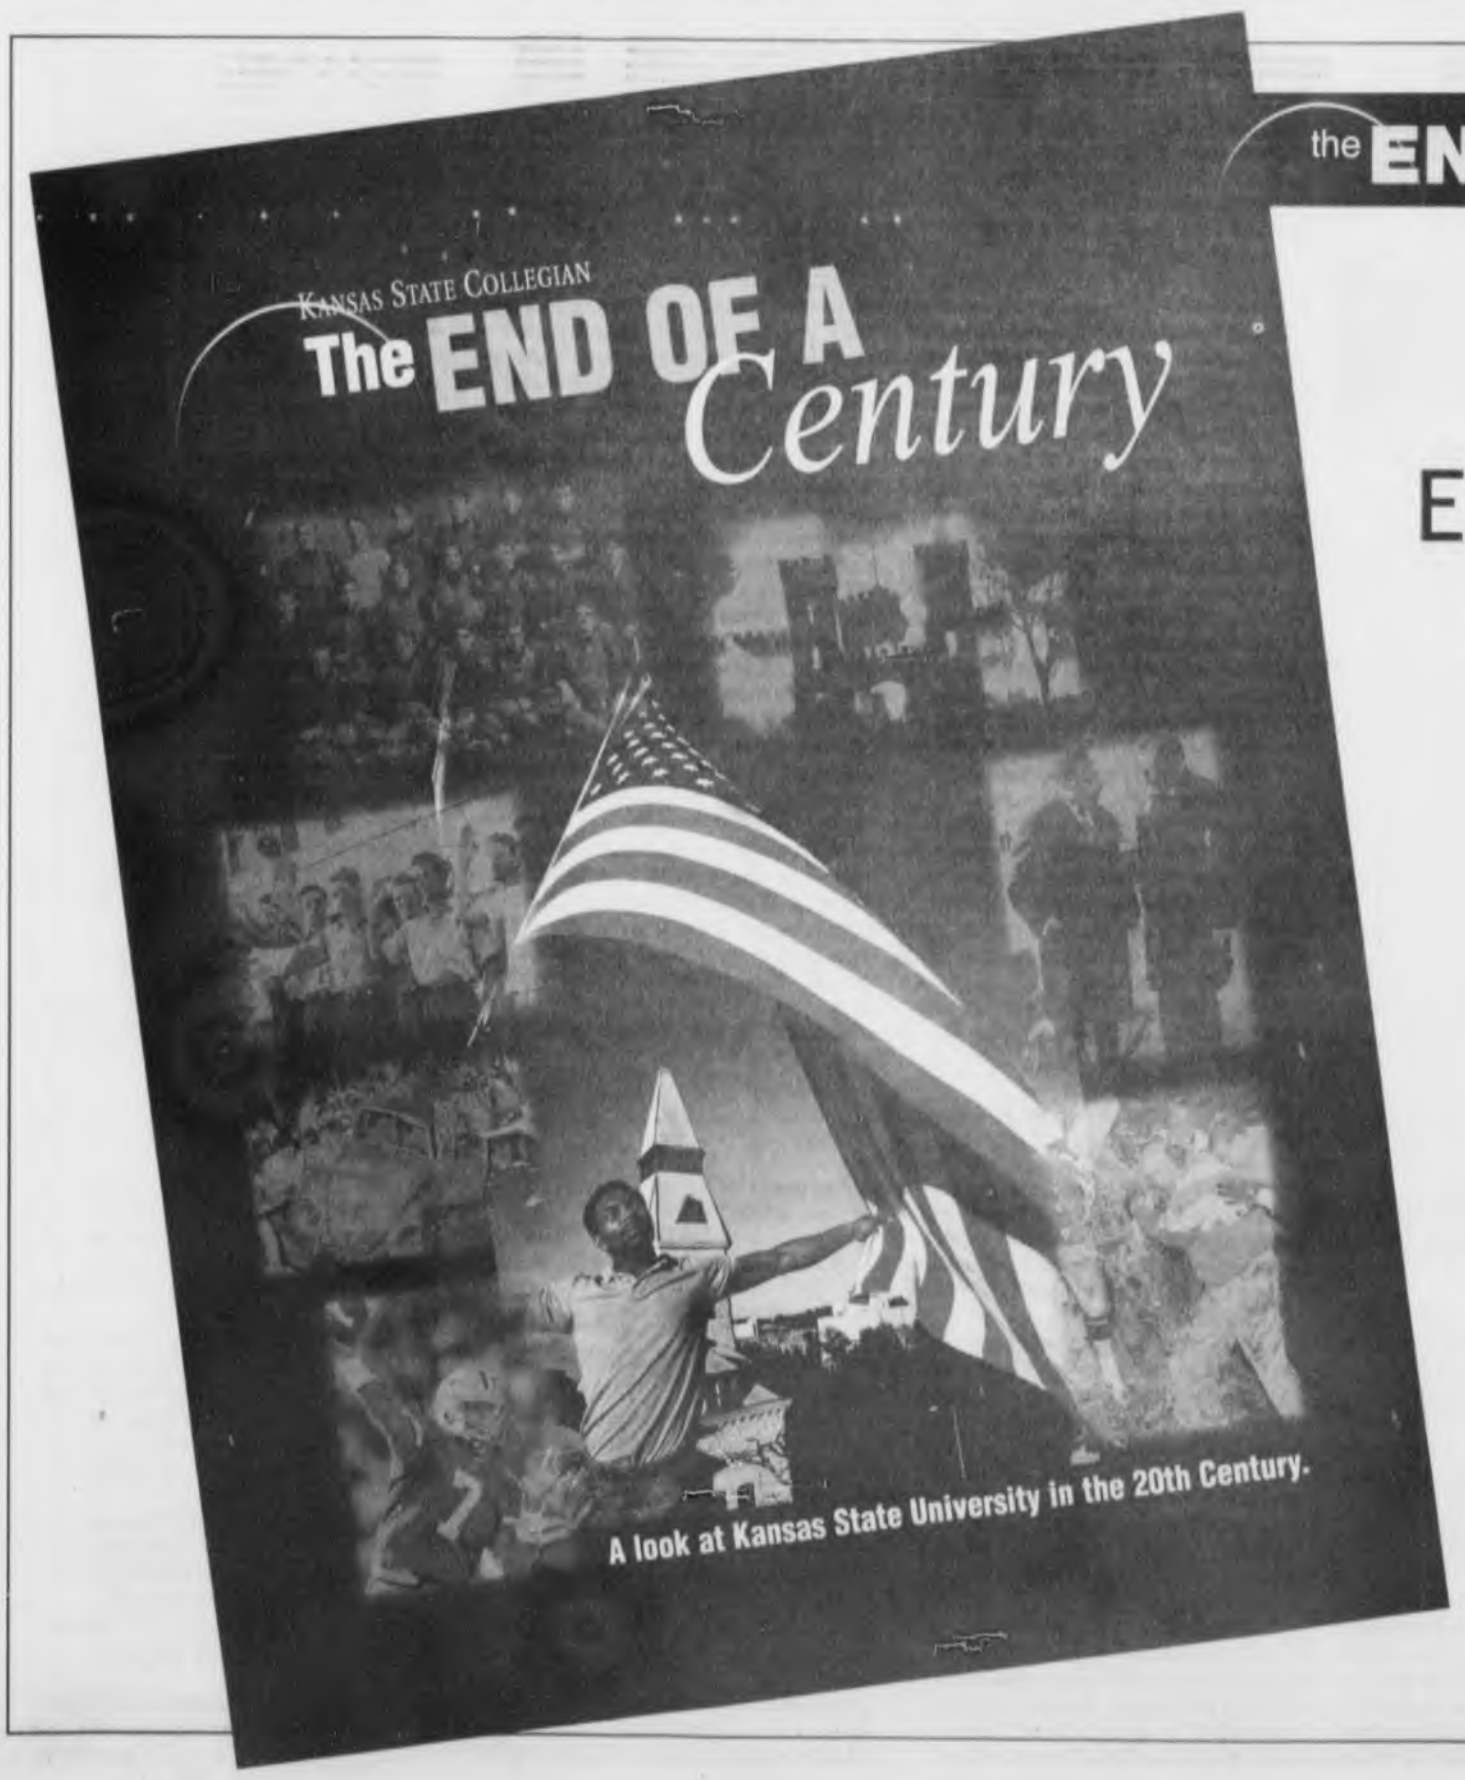
She said the Manhattan market is a good candidate for a family-oriented restaurant.

"We had a very friendly response from all of the people involved," Carlson said. "Everyone we have worked with has been great. The people are friendly, and it's a growing community."

The restaurant's previous Manhattan location was closed after discrepancies about its performance. Country Kitchen's new site will have different owners and new quality standards, Carlson said. Construction of the building started in November.

The 24-hour restaurant will join more than 260 other Country Kitchen locations nationwide and will hire up to 60 employees from the Manhattan area.

"We are looking to take all of our employees out of the Manhattan area," Carlson said.



Ann Harts, vice president of economic development at the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said the chamber discussed two restaurant projects with the owner, but Country Kitchen is the only planned project for the city. She said retail sales figures and area demographics were given to the owner before deciding to enter the Manhattan market.

"Any time there are more choices, it's always an exciting venture," Harts said.

K-State and Manhattan's growing population were deciding factors in bringing the restaurant to the city. Carlson said the amount of young professionals in Manhattan, combined with its retention of residents, were also attractive features of the Little Apple.

"We hope we can really make a positive influence and bring some dollars to the community," Carlson said. "We want to become the premier family restaurant in Manhattan."

Fans should support team in San Diego

Although official bowl invitations have not been sent, the K-State football team Wednesday announced its RSVP to the Culligan Holiday Bowl in San Diego, Calif.

That move has some fans upset at the team and Coach Bill Snyder. San Diego is a long trip for many, and the Holiday Bowl is on Dec. 29, rather than the traditional New Year's Day bowl many fans wanted.

Angry fans, however, need to direct their anger at a faulty bowl system that is all about money rather than about the team or its coaches.

And it is a faulty system. The Bowl Championship Series is broadcast by ABC, and it's in ABC's best interests to feature a team such as Michigan, which will get better ratings. The BCS is run by the commissioner of the Southeastern Conference. Of course it's in his best interest to ensure that an SEC team gets the second at-large bid.

When all is said and done, the bowl picture is more about the players than the fans. The players worked hard to get the team where it is today.

Yes, it's a travesty that the BCS probably will overlook K-State. But the fans shouldn't do the same. K-State has one football game left this year, and the stands should be filled to capacity with fans clad in purple and white.

The players deserve our support even more than they deserve a BCS bid.

Paybacks Are HELL

Erroneous maiden name leads to horrific recountings at Thanksgiving of past faux pas

About a month ago, my boyfriend, Rhett, expressed interest in sending my mother a birthday card to commemorate her special day. I thought the idea was nice in a decidedly trite sort of way, but I went along with it anyway.

At the time the idea was presented, Rhett was off in Ohio in a hay workshop or something equally titillating. Thus, we were relying heavily on e-mail for our primary means of communication, basically because I was going to have to sell off at least one vital organ to pay for our last phone bill. Ah, the financial perils of long distance romance. But, I digress.

So Rhett e-mailed me to let me know he had purchased said birthday card and was preparing to send it; however, he just wanted to make sure that my mother took my father's name when they married in order to properly address the envelope.

Now, I'm thinking to myself, how many stay-at-home moms who don't even realize the feminine revolution ever happened keep their maiden names? So, just to have a little fun with the situation, I responded by letting Rhett know, that my mom did, in fact, keep her maiden name and he should address the card to Kathy Kobolowski. At the time, I failed to realize that sarcasm is sometimes lost in written communication.

And so the card was mailed to Kathy Kobolowski, who in reality is Kathy Mathes, and whose maiden name of Matney is nowhere near Kobolowski.

Rhett failed to see the humor in the situation, especially when my mother presupposed (and see if you can follow this line of rationale) that Kobolowksi was the last name of Rhett's ex-girlfriend.

I should have expected some sort of retaliation; in retrospect, Rhett handled it much too amiably.

However, dear Rhett bided his time and waited until he would have the opportunity to have all of those near and dear to me: Thanksgiving. I began to suspect that something was amiss about halfway through Thanksgiving dinner at my grandma's. Things were already a little tense because my grandma somehow had broken the mixer, and my grandpa had to break out the cordless drill to finish mashing the potatoes.

Rhett and I both were seated at the children's table because, in the Mathes family, you have to be at least 35 with a second mortgage and a family sedan before you graduate to the adult table. While I was trying to avoid the handfuls of cranberry gelatin my little cousin was hurling across the table, Rhett began asking my mom for fun and embarrassing stories about my childhood. My mother was only too happy to oblige.

My mom talked about how when I was 10-years-old, I had to draw pictures of the male and female genitalia and present them to my parents for their scrutiny. Apparently, then I had to explain "making love." (I believe that was the word the mother decided upon after discarding "copulation.") I don't remember any of this, but my mom seemed to recount the entire story with impeccable clarity.

Uncle Carl got in the spirit, even though, mentally speaking, he's about as sharp as a spoon. Uncle Carl wears sweatpants every year to Thanksgiving, and this year, they were blue and snug. He also wore sunglasses the entire meal. And no, we did not dine on the patio, nor does Grandma have fluorescent lighting in the dining room. Uncle Carl talked about how, when I was about 2, I announced at Thanksgiving dinner that my mom had a hairy thing.

At this point in the discussion, I had about enough of the trip down memory lane and suggested we enjoy some of the peach pie I prepared. Although, I might as well admit now that I picked it up at Dillons en route that morning and had the lady behind the deli counter wrap it in Saran Wrap to give the appearance that it had been homemade.

Honesty is tough.

Before we left that day, there were a few more oh-so-funny stories about my childhood (such as when my little brothers used to steal my training bras and tie them to the handlebars of their bikes). Just when I thought we were done, my grandpa asked me how the flute was going. I reminded him that I quit the clarinet about eight years ago.

On the ride home, Rhett seemed quite pleased with himself. Every now and then I would catch him chuckling and muttering something to himself about a "hairy thing."

But, as they say, let bygones be bygones, water under the bridge. After all, I just purchased my plane ticket to spend Christmas with his family in Arizona, and as they also say, paybacks are hell.

Starr should be admired for fortitude in face of scorn

Today, I'm going to give you a portrait of a true American hero. Someone who has courageously and selflessly served his country, despite the personal and public costs. Someone who has fought tirelessly for truth and justice. Someone who has endured scorn, ridicule and an extremely hostile news media with class and integrity. His name — Kenneth Starr.

Perhaps no public figure in the United States is more misunderstood and mischaracterized than Starr. On Oct. 18, after nearly 5 years in the public eye, he stepped down and handed the mantle to his successor, the new Independent Counsel Robert Ray. As Starr's name leaves the front pages and gradually enters the history books, it seems fitting to take a closer look at this man.

Starr originally was appointed to direct the investigation into President and Hillary Clinton's dealings in the Whitewater scandal. But as he pursued it further, more and more potential wrongdoings came to light — sexual harassment, rape, perjury. So wide-ranging were these possible crimes that in the face of a completely uncooperative White House, Starr's office was able to pursue only a few of the leads. Nevertheless, one historic week in fall 1998, the Starr report was released, and all hell broke loose.

For the next year, Starr, a duly authorized and appointed public servant who was doing the job he had been given, would bear the brunt of the most vicious series of attacks I ever have seen directed at a non-elected official. James Carville, speaking for the president so Clinton wouldn't have to do the dirty work, made it his mission to destroy Starr both professionally and personally. He even wrote an entire book attacking Starr.

It wasn't just the White House, either. Partisan congressmen, reporters and pundits spared no opportunity to denigrate Starr. What was Starr doing so wrong?

Well, he was doing his job. As independent counsel, he was to investigate, and if necessary, prosecute any crimes committed by Clinton and his associates. He did precisely that. In his investigation, despite numerous obstructions of justice by the White House, he was able finally to collect enough evidence to charge that the president of the United States had committed a felony crime that is punishable by up to 10 years in prison. That crime was perjury — lying under oath.

Not liking the message, and not wanting to face up to the fact that maybe, just maybe, it was wrong for a 50ish-year-old married man to have sex with an employee half his age,and then lie about it in a court of law, Clinton supporters decided to attack the messenger.

Though he has never been found guilty of even the slightest ethics violations, Starr was attacked as being partisan, mean-spirited, vicious, driven by a personal vendetta, obsessed with matters that weren't his business and a threat to democracy. What a display of hypocrisy. Perhaps the president's cronies should have looked in the mirror before opening their mouths. They even insinuated that because of his Christian faith, Starr was unfit for public office.

What drove Starr to endure years of personal attacks and media scrutiny when he could have taken a position as dean of Pepperdine University's law school in Malibu, Calif.?

I recall watching a prime-time interview with him in the midst of all the controversy. The reporter was relentless. Every single question was loaded. She made him repeat himself over and over again. She was out to get Starr, and she wasn't planning on leaving without his head in a basket. It was attack-dog journalism at its finest.

But Starr did not break, did not become flustered or impatient, did not even raise his voice. Over and over, he calmly explained what motivated and sustained him: truth, justice, a belief that no one — no matter how popular or politically powerful — is above the law, a strong loyalty to his country. Such that when called upon to serve, he would go faithfully. And a deep personal faith that guided him through some very difficult days.

To those who say truth and justice do not matter, that it is OK to lie, commit adultery and break the law, Starr's existence seemed to be a prick in their consciences. To those liberals who ran off to Canada to smoke pot the last time their country called on them to serve, Starr's patriotic devotion is simply incomprehensible. To those who do not believe that someday right will be rewarded and wrong will be punished, Starr's calm and pleasant demeanor throughout the ordeal was baffling.

No matter how low the mudslinging became, he never responded in kind, and if he was angry or resentful he never seemed to show it. He pursued truth and justice undeterred. Guided by his faith, he chose to turn the other cheek and trust that justice would be done.

In an Oct. 30 interview with WORLD magazine, Starr relates that his motive in accepting the position as Independent Counsel was twofold: "To uphold the principle of the basic accountability of all individuals in our system, including the president himself … to serve the honest administration of the justice system and to uphold it when there was perversion of the system through improper or possibly illegal activity."

Did he succeed? His office won every single one of the 20 legal questions it argued in a court of law. Several criminals are behind bars now. "Among judges and lawyers, it is widely seen that we had a job to do, and that's what we did," he said. No, the president is not behind bars, but he is under a cloud and under the law. As WORLD noted, "A string of judicial decisions won by Mr. Starr will make it harder for future presidents to dissemble and evade when called upon to explain their actions."

Starr is now very much enjoying his status as a private citizen, out of the public eye. He is looking forward to writing a book on the Supreme Court, teaching at New York University, working with at-risk youth in a poverty-stricken area of Washington, D.C., and working with Advocates International on behalf of persecuted Christians worldwide. He is content and satisfied. His faith in the judicial system of America is still unshaken.

For these reasons, Starr is someone whom I greatly admire. It is my hope that, through the often-clearer lens of history, more Americans will see Ken Starr for what he was — just another man doing his job and faithfully serving his country.

'Just because' not good reason to remove McCulloh from office

Editor,

It has come to my attention many people are terribly misinformed about the recall election of Karen McCulloh, which will take place on Tuesday. The issue at hand dates back to last spring, when McCulloh and two other city commissioners voted to remove the Ten Commandments monolith from the front of City Hall. The monolith had been displayed there since 1958, when the Fraternal Order of Eagles donated it to the city of Manhattan.

I would like to point out that the issue at hand is not whether the Ten Commandments deserved to be removed. Neither is it whether the ACLU is a puppet institution set up by evil squirrels to donate money to the library and thus destroy human society as we know it. Rather, the issue is whether McCulloh was right to act according to the dictates of her conscience on this issue. While I do not necessarily agree with the decision she made, the fact remains that she made the decision with the best interests of the community of Manhattan at heart.

I would plead with those who read this letter not to let their personal feelings get in the way of the decision that we as a community now face. It would be a terrible miscarriage of democracy if we ousted a loyal City Commission member who did what she perceived to be the right thing at the time. In fact, that is an exceedingly silly way to run a democracy. Why should the people penalize their duly elected representative for obeying her conscience?

It boils down to this: in recalling McCulloh, we would be ruining her entire political career and depriving ourselves of a loyal civil servant. It seems to me that the multitude of signs which say "Vote Yes … just because" don't provide a compelling reason for the punishment of an innocent woman.

Aggieville parking tickets show mixed support for sober driving

Editor,

I don't understand these mixed signals. Not too long ago, I received two parking tickets in Aggieville. In the wee hours of the morning as the bars were closing, in a drunken stupor I made the responsible decision to get a ride home.

Instead of attempting to drive myself, I left my car parked in Aggieville over night. Before I could get my car the following day, after I sobered up, I received two parking tickets.

Why discourage me from drunk driving, then give me a parking ticket when I leave my car in Aggieville because I got a sober ride? The city of Manhattan does not want people parking in Aggieville so they can clean the streets about twice a week, remove snow and have periodic events (on some game days or holidays, Aggieville is closed to cars).

I don't mean to seem naive. I know allowing people to park in Aggieville will not stop drunk driving completely, but what if it helps to keep a few drunk drivers off the road? It would be worth it to Manhattan to help save lives, prevent injuries and avoid property damages.

To the Aggieville Business Association, Manhattan City Commission and other concerned, responsible Manhattan residents, we need to stop giving parking tickets in Aggieville after the bars close. Let's discourage drunk driving and make it easier to accept sober rides.

Architecture students consider options to redo visitors' center

BY NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Architects usually are concerned with new buildings instead of renovating older ones.

However, a group of fourth-year students in architecture have spent the semester looking for ways to remodel the upper level of the Quinlan Visitors Center in associate professor of architecture John Selfridge's architectural design studio.

"It is a different project — most projects are pretty modern, but our professor had been thinking about a project like this for a while."

— Ryan Haines, fourth-year student in architecture

The center is on the grounds of the University Gardens. The building's lower level serves as a visitors' center, but the second floor, the subject of the class's interest, is used for storage.

The renovation of the center has been a new experience for Ryan Haines, a student in the class.

"It is a different project — most projects are pretty modern, but our professor had been thinking about a project like this for a while," Haines said.

The class members plan to take the work they have done and nominate the building for historical societies.

"We are devoting an entire semester to looking at the barn and to see what one has to do in order to nominate it for the historical register," Selfridge said.

The project is multifaceted, another student, Kurt Thompson, said.

"It has a whole realm of things to do," Thompson said. "We did drawings, paperwork — we took photographs and created a Web site, along with a physical model."

The Web site will serve as a compilation of Selfridge's class and the History of American Agriculture class taught by Bonnie Lynn-Sherow, assistant professor of history.

The architecture students have completed work in phases. The initial phase was to gather data from University Archives and the campus architect, followed by designing a model of the structure.

"This was done before the final project was decided on," student Aaron Falk said. "Basically, before anybody started drawing stuff up, we started from the model."

Another student, Marcela Oviedo, said the project helps preserve history.

"It's an important part of our history, and we should take care of it," she said. "That is what the project is about."

The Quinlan center is a cornerstone of the University Gardens and has a rich history. It is a place where farmers have worked for years, said Leroy Visser, a Milo, Mo., resident formerly of Manhattan.

"I remember hauling hay up here from our farm to sell," Visser said.

With all the hay removed from the barn, the area is being used for storage. Selfridge's students went in search of new uses for the space. Thompson said the students came up with a variety of ideas.

"The programs ranged from a museum and gift shop to turning the entire barn into a banquet hall," Thompson said. "Another idea was to do nothing and leaving it as is and allowing the building to rot and decay."

Thompson said the class' 15 students participated in a scaled-down bidding process. The students had the opportunity to pitch their ideas to campus administrators and people who might have a potential interest in the project.

Thompson said the presentations received positive feedback.

"A lot of the same comments could be said to each project, but a lot of the comments were different for each individual group," Thompson said. "In general, the comments were positive."

Class members said they want to preserve the barn's integrity. The project will culminate with different group members presenting their case for the building's nomination to the historical register.

"In terms of registration, we are starting to have done archives that will allow us to write an appropriate application to the register of historic buildings," Selfridge said. "We have talked about this to the point where now we can discuss our ideas with the administration and other officials on what to do next. This has been a very useful enterprise on helping decide what to do next."

ROLLOVER
Two vehicles collided at 5:13 p.m. Thursday at the intersection of Claflin Road and College Avenue when a Ford Explorer failed to yield the right of way when turning left onto Claflin and was struck by a northbound Pontiac 6000 before rolling over, according to authorities. The passenger of the Explorer received slight injuries, and no one else was hurt.

Union construction leaves safety phone down

BY COURTNEY DUFFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The purpose of the 25 campus safety phones is to help students in need.

Don Barrett, planning and installation supervisor at K-State Telecommunications said the only phone that has been out of order in the past 18 months is the phone near Ahearn Field House.

He said the phone lost its line earlier in the K-State Student Union's construction process. He said a cable line was broken earlier in the construction process when construction crews were digging near the line.

"The only phone that has been covered up during the last 18 months is the one at Ahearn," Barrett said.

Barrett said the phone is still not working because the construction is unfinished. He also said he didn't want to repair the line because he feared it would be disconnected again by diggers.

Barrett said the phones are usually repaired quickly when a problem is reported.

Barrett said he recently has been informed that the construction at the Union has slowed down and that there will be no more digging near the cable line, and he wants to get the line fixed soon.

"I was going to get a contractor up here to replace the line in the next week," Barrett said. When the line is repaired, it will restore the campus safety lines fully. Lt. David Johnson of the K-State Police said the phones were first set up about 15 years ago.

"Initially, they were called emergency phones," Johnson said. "We found people were hesitant to use them for anything else. We have tried to get people to use them for information, emergencies, escorts or directions."

The campus adds two or three additional safety phones annually, Johnson said.

"Each year, two or three go in," Johnson said. "We started 15 years ago, and it increases."

Johnson said a call for help goes directly into the K-State Police dispatch. The department is notified of a call from by light that goes on to alerts the police of a problem at one of the campus safety phones.

"They ring into the police dispatch. Each time the phone is activated, it lights up," Johnson said. "We always send officers, because you never know if it is an accident or horseplay."

Johnson said the police check all safety phones on campus on a regular basis. The department checks to see if they are working correctly.

"The police department checks them weekly," he said.

Some students think the safety phones are useful, but not used often.

"I think there good to have, but I do not think many people use them," said Samantha Warren, freshman in business administration.

Cats prepare to play Privateers Saturday

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After an emotional come-from-behind victory Wednesday night over St. Louis, the Wildcats will need to regain their composure as they play host to New Orleans Privateers at noon Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum.

"We need to get our feet back on the ground, but I don't think that will be a problem," assistant coach Mark Fox said. "It makes you excited about the next opponent. The kids are really looking forward to playing this game."

K-State (3-1) is led by senior forward Tony Kitt, who provided Wednesday's late-game heroics, knocking down two free throws with two seconds remaining to propel the Wildcats to a 69-68 victory. Kitt this season is averaging a double-double (14.8 points, 10.0 rebounds).

The Privateers (2-2) are led by two newcomers to their program, juniors Nathaniel Bailey and Clyde Ellis. Bailey, a 5-foot-9-inch guard, averages 13.5 points a game.

"He's a really good player — a Big 12-type player," Fox said. "We're going to have to contain him. If you can contain a team's leading scorer, then that gives you a good chance to win the ballgame."

Ellis, a forward, is New Orleans' presence in the post. The 6-7, 230-pounder averages 12.8 points and 5.8 rebounds.

"They're a pretty good basketball team," Fox said of New Orleans. "They have some new faces, and it may take a little time for them to find a groove, but they have a couple of talented junior-college guys that are stepping in and playing pretty well. They will be a good opponent for us."

The Privateers have reached the NCAA Tournament or National Invitation Tournament in nine of the past 13 seasons, including the 1996 NCAA tourney and the 1997 NIT. New Orleans has won the Sun Belt Conference's regular-season championship in seven of the past 12 years, including back-to-back titles in 1995-96 and '96-97.

In Saturday's lineup, Fox said 6-3 senior Desmond Baxter, a returning starter from last year, is expected to join Bailey in the backcourt. Baxter adds range from the outside, making six of nine three-point attempts and averaging 9.3 points a game.

Fox said senior returning starter Tory Walker, a 6-8 forward who has missed much of this season because of injury, is back to full strength and will be a threat off the bench for Coach Joey Stiebing, in his third year at the school.

Senior guard Cortez Groves continues to lead the Cat scoring barrage, averaging 15.0 points, but his most impressive stat is not committing a turnover in 30 minutes against St. Louis and playing despite the flu.

"Cortez has played very solid basketball in the backcourt," Fox said. "He's playing very well, and I think he's played well against some good people. Now, he just needs to maintain that level of play throughout the season."

The Wildcats as a team committed only 16 turnovers against the Billikens, their season low.

Head coach Tom Asbury has yet to determine who will start at point guard between Josh Kimm and Galen Morrison.

Wildcat wrestlers complete season against NCAA foes

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's fall wrestling season has been quite the eye-opener for the Wildcats.

"If you don't wrestle the best, then you'll never get better," sophomore Chris Warren said.

This has been the Wildcats' motto every time they set foot on the mat this year.

Since last year's reformation of the club, which last saw action in 1975, K-State has not been shy of competing with the best in the nation.

This season, the Wildcats have attended tournaments featuring the top wrestling programs in the country.

On Nov. 15, K-State participated in the Central Missouri State Open in Warrensburg, Mo. The tourney featured the likes of NCAA powerhouses Iowa, Oklahoma and Central Oklahoma, as well as Missouri Valley, which ranks as the No. 1 NAIA team in the nation.

"Getting to wrestle teams like that was neat," Warren said. "I wasn't intimidated, but I could tell there was a different level of intensity. It was a lot different than what I was used to in high school."

The Wildcats sent five wrestlers to Missouri, and Warren said each came back to Manhattan a better wrestler after facing such stiff competition.

"Wrestling good competition will always help you in the long run," he said. "In college wrestling, everyone's an all-star — there's no mediocre wrestlers."

Although the tournament was a difficult one for the K-State club wrestling squad, Warren said the experience was a good one for such a young team.

"I just wanted to wrestle to my potential," he said. "There was tremendous competition everywhere. It was a big change, and it's just going to take time to make the transition to that kind of collegiate wrestling."

Warren said he could sense the high level of competition.

"The nerves and butterflies hit me until my first match," he said. "You could tell when you walked into the room, the high intensity level."

Last Saturday, the team traveled to Norman, Okla., for the Sooner Open. Three K-State wrestlers competed against dominant NCAA programs such as Oklahoma, Oklahoma State and Central Oklahoma. Other prominent squads included Air Force, Northern Iowa and club teams from Texas and Texas A&M.

Warren said the tournament was even a bigger experience than the one in Missouri.

"The atmosphere was totally different," he said. "This tournament was the big one — it was the big time. It was very intense, the best of the best. You couldn't ask for a tougher tournament."

The difficult foes K-State has faced this fall help the team improve in preparation for the National Collegiate Wrestling Association competition next semester, Warren said.

"You can tell the difference in our team from our first week of conditioning. Our intensity and technique have really improved. It is our goal to win the NCWA this spring."

Upcoming meets

K-State will compete in the Fort Hays State Open on Sunday and then will travel to Lexington, Mo., Tuesday for a double-dual with Kansas and Wentworth Military College.

The team also is planning to take wrestlers to the Neosho County Community College Open on Dec. 11 in Chanute, Kan.

Wildcat Classic tournament wins crucial for women's basketball team

STORY BY SARAH CRAIG

K-State is the host of Commerce Bank's Wildcat Classic in a tournament that matches K-State and Alabama State in the first round at 7 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

The tournament opens at 5 p.m. as Idaho and North Carolina-Wilmington meet. The winner then will play the winner of the K-State-Alabama State contest at 7 p.m. Saturday night.

The Cats look to improve their 2-2 record this weekend with home wins — something they consider crucial.

"We want to win both games," senior center Angie Finkes said. "I think it's just another thing of us playing at the level we can play at. If we do that, we're going to come out and do well at the tournament if we can play like we have these last three games. Plus, it's at home. We don't want to lose any home games this season."

Alabama State will present both zone and man defense as well as full-court pressure, something that head coach Deb Patterson said she feels confident her team can handle.

"I feel really good about our ability in the full court, particularly after our experience in Cancun against NC State — they pressed us for 40 minutes," Patterson said. "As long as we're making good decisions and taking care of the ball, we will be fine against the full-court pressure."

The Hornets bring to the floor a motion-offense that requires individuals play extremely well. Patterson said the Cats' experience on the court puts them at the advantage in light of that.

"Alabama State plays a real motion-oriented, freelance style on the offensive end and really rely a great deal on their athleticism and ability to rebound the basketball," Patterson said. "They're a young team, and so they're really doing a lot of different things right now on both ends of the floor, and I think we should certainly be in a position where our experience is going to be a strength."

Patterson said the main concern for her team after coming off a win Tuesday night against Eastern Michigan is to improve and focus on getting better as a whole.

"We talked after the game about the fact that each day and each game is about getting better," Patterson said. "I think we do need to get better as we head into the tournament. Our offensive rebounding needed a lot of emphasis. I think we have to continue to look at our posts that are playing over 20 minutes and say, 'You need to be close to double-figure boards.' We've got to have all three post players close to or at double digits on the boards."

Holiday Bowl berth demonstrates Cats' lack of national respect

VIEWPOINT

MIKE VIETTI

"If we took a holiday, it would be, it would be so nice!"

Hmm ... for some reason, the typed lyrics to one of Madonna's first hit songs, "Holiday," just don't have the same punch as her exhilarating vocals.

It's sort of funny, the same thing probably could be said of K-State's announced bowl destination: the Culligan Holiday Bowl.

Although San Diego as a city is probably more appealing to travel to than Dallas for the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl, I'm not sure the same can be said for the Holiday Bowl's stature within the realm of college football.

K-State will play Washington (7-4), which lost to a couple of Mountain West Conference teams, Brigham Young and Air Force, and to fellow Pac-10 teams Arizona State and UCLA.

Had K-State played in the Cotton Bowl, the Wildcats probably would have met either Arkansas (7-4) or Georgia (7-4). I know the records are the same, but you can't possibly believe that the Southeastern Conference, in which both teams play, is even close to being as poor as the Pac-10, which has a grand total of one team ranked in either of the top 25 polls.

Or can you?

"This would be our first matchup with a Pac-10 Conference team, historically one of the nation's top conferences," Athletic Director Max Urick said in the media release confirming K-State's destination.

Max, you're completely, absolutely wro ... oh, wait, you put "historically" in there.

That's like saying, "K-State historically has sucked in football." Who cares about "historically? I can guarantee neither of the polls will, with a thrashing of Washington.

It appears as if K-State will play in the Holiday Bowl because from now on, the Cotton Bowl will get dibs on the loser of the Big 12 Championship game.

I'm wondering if this isn't just a fluke, though — Texas is going to lose to Nebraska and the Cotton Bowl people know this, so Texas, much like last year, will fall right into their lap.

Just for pondering's sake, let's say Oklahoma State was in the Big 12 Championship game and was expected to lose to Nebraska instead. Would the Cotton Bowl still want the Cowboys over a 10-1 K-State team ranked in the top 10 in both polls and the Bowl Championship Series rankings?

Hmm ... for some reason, I think not.

An even bigger question is whether the big man himself, head coach Bill Snyder, still was so miffed at the Cotton Bowl for snubbing the Wildcats last year that he acted in a defiant manner and chose to bowl in San Diego.

The rumor mill (I'm not a part of it, I just spread what I hear) is saying that the Cotton Bowl actually wanted K-State, but Snyder, either by his own decision, a vote by the players or a combination of the two, decided on the Holiday Bowl instead.

There are possible repercussions for this decision. There is no way that K-State fans will pack the Holiday Bowl like they would have filled the Cotton Bowl. I'm thinking the players will be lucky to have more then 25,000 fans in Qualcomm Stadium on Dec. 29. K-State probably could have had 40,000-plus again in Dallas.

Another concern is what will happen if the national media (The Collegian doesn't count) takes hold of the previously mentioned angle, that Snyder, his players or both will hold a grudge against a bowl for not picking K-State previously?

Will that affect how K-State bowls in the future?

Who knows?

Regardless of which bowl the Cats play in this year, though, the lack of national respect that continues to plague K-State will not be cured by a victory over any of the three aforementioned teams. Until K-State again gets into a big bowl and defeats a historically respected team (Damn! Maybe Urick was right?) such as Michigan or Tennessee, K-State will not be seen as a totally legitimate football team.

Think about this: Had the Wildcats been ranked higher than No. 20 at the beginning of the year, K-State would have been ranked second or third at the time of the loss to Nebraska. After the loss, K-State wouldn't have fallen so far in the polls and would be ahead of teams like Wisconsin, Tennessee and Michigan and would have an excellent shot at a BCS bowl.

Does any of this gossiping really matter?

Probably not. I'm one of the firm believers that the Y2K disaster will mutate and strike a few weeks early on Sunday, minutes before the bowl show on ABC, causing Nebraska to jump ahead of Virginia Tech and thus allowing K-State entrance into the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl to play Tennessee.

Oh, all right, I guess I'll jump back into reality and settle for a Madonna-type "Holiday."

But can Madonna be there, too?

She sure would be a "Ray of Light" on the situation.

Students to collect books for local resource centers

The K-State Student Foundation, in partnership with the Lock-ett Up Foundation, will sponsor a book drive next week to collect educational materials for children in need.

The event will be at the Manhattan Wal-Mart on Sunday through Dec. 11.

Diane Hinrichs, adviser for the Student Foundation, said the drive will collect new books, educational games and computer software and games.

Once collected, the items will be donated to local resource centers and families with children in need this holiday season.

Hinrichs said the Student Foundation was considering several community-service projects when a member of the Lock-ett Up Foundation suggested sponsoring a book drive.

The Lock-ett Up foundation is a nonprofit organization established by former K-State football player Kevin Lockett. Lockett is a wide receiver with the Kansas City Chiefs, and he is looking to expand his charitable organization.

"Since the Lock-ett Up Foundation is fairly new and a smaller organization, it would be difficult for them to do something like this on their own," Hinrichs said. "We have the numbers to put on a drive and decided this would be a good way to create a connection between the Student Foundation and Lock-ett Up Foundation."

Contributions can be made at the Manhattan Wal-Mart at any time between Sunday and Dec. 11.

Organizers said student representatives will be present to collect cash donations on Sunday between noon and 5 p.m. All contributions made to the foundation are tax-deductible.

Woman, 7-month-old son die in wreck near Junction City

JUNCTION CITY — A Fort Riley woman and her infant son died after their car collided with a vehicle occupied by another woman and her baby.

The car driven by Meghan Kennedy, 21, went out of control Wednesday afternoon near Junction City. It slid across the road and collided with a sport utility vehicle driven by the other woman.

Kennedy's 7-month-old son died at a Manhattan hospital shortly after the accident, and she died early Thursday morning at a Wichita hospital.

The other woman and her 2-week-old daughter were treated and released from a hospital in Fort Riley.

Mexican graves reveal legacy of city's drug war

BY NIKO PRICE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CIUDAD JUAREZ, Mexico — Dozens of graves such as the ones FBI and Mexican agents began digging up this week dot the hills around this border city, drug experts and residents say.

It is an open secret that only now is being made public, a legacy of the drug war that plunged this city into violence and chaos in a battle for control of the world's most lucrative drug corridor.

Drug experts and local activists also charge that it is a secret carefully protected by some Mexican police and politicians paid off to look the other way — and even to guard the clandestine graveyards.

The Mexican government and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration know that every significant drug figure who has a ranch has graves on that ranch, said Phil Jordan, retired head of the DEA intelligence center just across the border in El Paso, Texas.

"And the Mexican police know there are graves on those ranches, because they're the ones protecting them."

It was only because an informant went to the FBI to report a mass grave behind a cinderblock barn on the Rancho la Campana that the bodies have begun to be pulled from the dirt, analysts said. The informant claimed there were 100 bodies buried at the ranch; authorities thus far have reported finding six.

"They couldn't hide it any longer," said Guadalupe Ramirez, secretary of the Independent Chihuahua State Committee for the Defense of Human Rights. "We always believed there were bodies on more ranches. It's only because of the U.S. pressure that it has come out."

Sensitive to the charge, Mexican Attorney General Jorge Madrazo said Wednesday that his office had been investigating the disappearances for years and compiling a list of the missing.

Seattle cracks down on rioters; ministers wage trade battles

BY DIRK BEVERIDGE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — President Clinton, urging that worker rights and environmental safeguards be included in global trade talks, is getting a chilly reception from Third World nations as trade officials open serious negotiations after a two-day disruption by street protests.

Demonstrators clashed with police Thursday, a mile from the convention center where delegates from 135 nations are meeting. Police used tear gas, flash bombs and pepper spray to scatter the crowd while protesters and residents of the upper-middle-class neighborhood shouted at police and National Guard troops to leave.

As an aside to the trade summit, Clinton signed an International Labor Organization treaty aimed at outlawing the worst forms of child labor, including slavery and prostitution. The treaty was approved unanimously in June by the ILO, a U.N. arm.

With business and labor leaders looking on, Clinton said the treaty affirms human rights and emphasizes the fragility and importance of childhood.

Clinton's call for more openness and attention to the environment and worker rights in trade negotiations echoed the demands of thousands of protesters who have been demonstrating peacefully. The president saluted those demonstrators but condemned the relatively small number tangling with police.

Protest groups had their own news conference Thursday to say more marches are planned and to decry what some called an infringement on their right to assemble.

"I've witnessed things in the last four days that I didn't believe could happen in America," said John Goodman of the United Steelworkers of America.

Meanwhile, a spokeswoman for the Downtown Seattle Association said damages to some 2,500 city merchants and property owners from this week's disturbances will be in the millions range. Association marketing director Lucinda Payne said, "That's just the physical damage — the broken display windows, spot looting, and the horrific graffiti."

Payne said later that lost sales were estimated at $7 million and property damage has been estimated at $1 million.

"It's incredibly disappointing," she said. "This is not Seattle. And the folks doing this stuff were not Seattle, by and large. It was just random and senseless."

With today the deadline for wrapping up the World Trade Organization meeting, the commerce minister of Thailand, who takes over the top WTO post in 2002, said Wednesday that Clinton's stance on worker rights could jeopardize efforts to launch a round of trade talks.

"I know it is an important issue for the United States administration, but to have trade sanctions linked to labor rights violations would be really ultimately highly detrimental," Supachai Panitchpakdi said.

The Nutcracker
The family favorite is back for the holiday season. Danced by Ukraine's renowned Kyiv Ballet, this production returns to E.T.A. Hoffmann's tale and focuses on a young girl's unrequited love for a phantom prince and her journey into womanhood. Canada's Shumka dancers enliven the battle between the mice and toy soldiers and turn up as high–kicking Cossacks in the second act fantasy sequence.

premierePERFORMANCE

McCain Auditorium to be starting point for Kiev Ballet national tour

BY SHANNON DELMEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan will have the honor of launching the tour of a significant ballet company at 7 p.m. Sunday when the Ukraine's Kiev Ballet takes the McCain Auditorium stage for its performance of "The Nutcracker."

"To have the Kiev Ballet, which is one of the premier ballet companies in the entire world, performing this 'Nutcracker' means it's going to be an outstanding show," said Thom Jackson, marketing development officer for McCain. "They are going on a national tour, starting on the 5th of December, with the performance right here in McCain. It's the premiere performance that is going to be happening here. It's kind of monumental."

Jackson said having the Kiev Ballet make its premiere performance at K-State is an unusual experience.

"This is a rare opportunity in which we're not just a stopping point, but we are the starting point for a national tour," he said. "Most national tours would start off in some place like New York, or Boston or Chicago. Universities are typically the secondary cities. What makes this particular 'Nutcracker' extra special for us is that it's the very first time that the Kiev Ballet has performed in the United States."

The premiere performance is not the only thing that will make this "Nutcracker" an atypical show. This version will be more like the original version of the story, Jackson said.

"'The Nutcracker' traditionally has been done as a formal ballet," he said. "When it originated, it had both formal dance ballet and also folk dancing. There was a more hometown style to the show at the turn of the century."

Jackson said that when "The Nutcracker" began to grow in popularity, especially after coming to the United States, it became more of a higher art form, and the folk-dancing sections were removed. At that point, the show became strictly ballet.

"There are European touring companies, as well as American touring companies, that have gone so far away from the original that it's not even a Christmas story anymore," he said.

Jackson said this version will return to the original E.T.A. Hoffman book "The Nutcracker," because of a particular group of dancers, known as the Ukrainian Shumka dancers of Canada, that will perform with the Kiev Ballet. This group will perform the folk dances that were removed from the more current version of "The Nutcracker."

"Shumka means 'whirlwind' in Ukrainian, and that's what it's going to be like," said Joel White, production intern for McCain and junior in mass communications. "These guys are fast and they're going to jump around."

White said the Shumka dancers will be what makes audience members remember this particular "Nutcracker."

"These are the guys that are going to set this show apart from all other 'Nutcrackers' that most people have seen," he said. "They are going to be used in different parts of the ballet. They're going to be used as the mice in the battle scene. They're also going to be doing certain dances. One is called the Trepak, which is a traditional Russian 'Nutcracker' dance that is used in the battle scene.

"They will also do the Hopak, which is a traditional Ukrainian grand finale dance. These guys are going to be very fun to watch."

Although the show will incorporate folk dancing, the Kiev Ballet still will perform most of the show, Jackson said.

Of the 1,780 seats available for Sunday's performance, Jackson said 1,200 tickets already have been sold. Tickets range in price, with orchestra seats going for $28 for the general public, $26 for seniors and $14 for students and children; lower balcony seats, which are $24 for the general public, $22 for seniors and $12 for students and children; and upper balcony seats, which are $18 for the general public, $16 for seniors and $9 for students and children.

"They're going to be a visual feast," White said. "It's just going to be great to watch."

K-State calendars to feature professional photographer

BY KRISTEN DYMACEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Collegiate Calendars is hoping to improve the professional quality of the Men and Women of K-State calendars and its contest following a year of restructuring.

One of the improvements is the addition of a professional model photographer for the calendar shoot, said Bill Price, vice president of sponsorship and promotions.

"Jim Blakly will be photographing the shoot. He has been published in Cosmopolitan," Price said.

In addition to a professional photographer, Collegiate Calendars will have a photoshoot stylist to fix the models' hair and clothes and show proper poses.

A model coordinator also will be available to make sure the models' needs and wants are taken care of, Price said.

"The models will be experiencing a truly professional photo shoot," he said.

Dave Lewis, vice president of promotions for Collegiate Calendars, said the improvements are a good reason for potential contestants to try out for the calendar.

"One of the biggest things we want to get out to the public is all of the internal restructuring we've done," Lewis said. "We want to take the photographs and the calendars to the next level."

Price said he agreed that Blakly's addition would help with the quality of the calendars.

"We want the pictures to be as professional as any other national calendars."

— Bill Price, vice president of sponsorship and promotions

"We want the pictures to be as professional as any other national calendars," he said. "We restructured for success and to produce the best calendar possible."

The models for both the men's and women's calendars will be chosen from K-State students who participate in a contest this spring, Price said.

The first 36 men and 36 women who send in the entry forms will be chosen to compete in one of the three nights of the contest.

"The contest consists of three rounds: the formal round, the casual round and the athletic round," Price said.

The formal round will require the men to wear suits or tuxedos and the women to wear cocktail dresses.

The casual round will have the contestants wearing T-shirts and jeans or shorts. The athletic round will consist of workout clothing or swim wear.

"We want to stress that this is not a swimsuit contest," Price said. "We know that some people are a little apprehensive about going onstage in a swimsuit."

He said a new addition to the contest is the opportunity for all of the contestants to have their names given to www.e-talentbase.com, a talent database company that takes orders from companies in search of models.

Any student can enter in the contest and have a shot at being added to the database, Price said.

"We're not after the sexiest women or the buffest men," he said.

Lewis said there are no physical requirements to compete in the contest.

"Basically, we're looking to see if you photograph well and look good in a calendar," he said.

The winners will be selected by a panel of judges. The judges will be representatives from the contest's sponsors as well as students from K-State greek organizations.

Price said that once the judges are chosen, they will go through a training session to learn the certain key areas of judging.

"We are trying to have better-qualified people to judge the contest," he said.

Lewis said a training session makes the judging system better.

"We're striving to be even more fair than last year," he said.

The winners of both the men's and women's contests will travel to South Fork, Texas, for the photo shoot at the end of May.

"The photo shoot is the week after finals and commencement, so students won't miss any classes," Price said.

Entry forms, contest information and exact contest dates will be available immediately after the semester break, he said. Contestants are chosen on a first come, first served basis.

"It's going to be the same exciting, upbeat, fun contest as before," Price said.

Belfast Cabinet meets, signs British-Irish pact

■ Meeting of Protestants, Catholics shatters taboos.

BY SHAWN POGATCHNIK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — On a day of historic firsts and defining moments, Irish Republican Army supporters sat down with their Protestant antagonists on Thursday in a new Northern Ireland government.

That first meeting produced no decisions but encouraged great hopes that three decades of bloodshed truly might be at an end.

"It seems we are at the end of a terrible era of violence and suffering, and at the beginning of a new era of life here," said Seamus Mallon, the Catholic deputy leader of the new government. "People are almost afraid to express that hope."

In that cautious spirit, the day passed in Belfast without the sort of big celebrations that followed the IRA cease-fire of 1994, which didn't last, and without the kind of mass protests that killed a short-lived attempt at power-sharing in 1974.

"It was a good start," said Martin McGuinness, the former IRA commander who now is responsible for education. He called the meeting cordial, respectful and businesslike.

"It is now possible to believe the day of the gun and the bomb are in fact over," President Clinton said in Seattle. It was Clinton's man, former Sen. George Mitchell, who prodded the parties to make the concessions necessary to form a government.

Earlier in Dublin, the Republic of Ireland amended its 1937 constitution to drop its territorial claim to the British province. Britain and Ireland also signed treaties to create all-Ireland and British-Irish institutions envisaged in the Good Friday accord of 1998.

"As we look into a new millennium, the people of Ireland and Britain are redefining their relationships as partners and equals," said Irish President Mary McAleese, a Belfast-born Catholic who had lunch at Buckingham Palace with Queen Elizabeth II.

In Belfast, 10 Protestant and Catholic ministers of the new power-sharing Cabinet sat down around a circular table inside Stormont Parliament Building to discuss, for 80 taboo-shattering minutes, how their new coalition would work.

They have to operate a government with broad domestic responsibilities, though the British government retains control of foreign affairs, taxes, policing and criminal justice.

At midnight Wednesday, the British government ended 27 years of direct rule — a system imposed in place of a Protestant-dominated Stormont Parliament that governed Northern Ireland from 1921 to 1972. In the long and bloody troubles, in which 3,600 people died, 1972 was the worst year of all, with 467 deaths.

First Minister David Trimble said the Protestants of his Ulster Unionist Party were eager to govern alongside their three unlikely partners: the moderate Catholics of the Social Democratic and Labor Party, the IRA-linked Sinn Fein party, and the hard-line Protestants of the Democratic Unionist Party.

"Of course we'll have differences of opinion," said Trimble, a co-winner of last year's Nobel Peace Prize, "but we'll make this thing work."

In one sign of difficulties ahead, the Democratic Unionists' two Cabinet ministers boycotted the meeting to protest Sinn Fein's involvement. And a DUP supporter heckled Trimble as he spoke, waving a banner that read, "For Sale: Ulster. For details contact D. Trimble."

The Democratic Unionists' deputy leader, Peter Robinson, said his party would never sit in Cabinet with the representatives of armed terror, who to this day still have not expressed any remorse for the death and destruction that they visited on this community. Robinson holds the title of minister for regional development in the Cabinet.

BERRY HARVEST

Six-year-old Jonathan Sachs, of Manhattan, picks wild berries with his godfather, Dan Overly, on the side of Manhattan Country Club hill on Thursday afternoon. Overly, visiting from Jackson, Miss., had collected a bag full of bright orange bittersweet vine, a plant he says is extinct in the rest of the country, during the outing.

the students are worrying more about their finals than hammering out their speeches," Brown said. "This is the last meet of the semester, so we would like to finish strong."

Last year, K-State's forensics program finished third in the country, and both Burtis and Brown said a national championship for the program is a possibility in the future.

"Our ultimate goal, of course, is to get a national championship," Brown said. "The debate squad has been national champions, but not many universities can make the claim that they are one of the very best in their all-around programs."

TREE

The owner of the property is Ray Hightower, assistant dean of engineering.

Justin Ringwald, pledge class president, said the participants did not know Hightower owned the property.

"The fraternity was going to go without a tree, so our pledge class got together and decided we'd go get one," he said. "We had no idea whose it was.

"It was a stupid decision, I guess."

Ricker said the fraternity did not condone theft of any kind.

"We are dealing with this within the house," Ricker said. "This is being taken very seriuosly — since it's a felony theft and since it was taken from a dean's yard. It's not going to be incredibly severe, because we can only go so far with what we do. But action will be taken."

The tree was valued at $800. The crime will be considered a felony theft, not a misdemeanor, because the theft amount is more than $500.

Hightower declined to comment on the situation.

Members of the fraternity met Thursday night to discuss the theft, Ricker said. He said the meeting was just to let all of the fraternity members know what happened.

"Not everyone knew what had happened," Ricker said. "We just talked about the exact circumstances surrounding the situation."

Ricker said the active body of the fraternity was going to have another meeting today to decide on punishment.

"This is a totally new incident for us," he said. "We're going to have another meeting tomorrow and decide what we're going to do."

Ringwald, freshman in computer engineering, said the pledges realized the incident was a mistake.

"The active body has discussed it. They're not taking it lightly," he said. "I have no idea what they're going to do. We've discussed it. Now we're just waiting to find out what's going to happen and what we need do."

Senate looks at proposal to revamp finals week

■ Plan would separate week of finals into 2 periods broken up by weekend; surveys show split student support.

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Finals week could undergo changes if Student Senate decides to pass a resolution favoring a weekend break.

The change would split finals week into two separate weeks, beginning on Thursday and lasting through the following week, leaving the weekend in between as a rest period for students.

HEINRICH

Student Body President Jason Heinrich said the issue is in the preliminary stages.

"We basically are doing research and getting feedback from students right now," he said. "We're working with the Registrar's Office. We've distributed surveys to see what students wanted."

At this point, survey results have been pretty evenly split, Heinrich said.

ECKERT

"It's about 50-50 right now," he said. "We'd like to get a little more publicity with this to see what students want."

Gabe Eckert, student body vice president, said Senate definitely will approve a resolution next semester concerning finals week.

"It will be one of two things," he said. "We will either pass a resolution supporting continuing doing finals week like we do now, or we will pass a resolution supporting changing finals week."

New Web site offers students information on government

■ Voter.com aims to simplify process of deciding on candidate to vote for.

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Potential voters in the 18- to 24-year-old age demographic historically have shown little motivation to appear at the polls on election day.

Voter.com, a new political Web source that caters especially to college students, is attempting to develop connections between college students and the government.

■ COLLEGE VOTERS
The new political Web source can be found on the Web at www.voter.com.

"The genesis of the idea came from our 26-year-old CEO, Justin Dangle," Priscilla Huff, Voter.com news director, said. "We're trying to make it easier for the average voter to decide who they will vote for. It can be difficult to find out what a candidate believes in."

Voters of all political leanings can find candidates and ideas they can identify with on the site, and undecided voters are given the chance to analyze the various candidates' platforms. Voter.com gathers information on candidates' and different special interest groups' ideologies and news stories from the political arena, all of which can easily be obtained with the click of a mouse, Huff said.

The site uses drop-down menus to facilitate comparison of different candidates and their positions, Huff said.

"The information is all entered by the candidates," Huff said. "You're getting it straight from them. It's a tool for them to get their message out."

Encouraging young people to get involved in the political process is important, said John Fliter, assistant professor of political science.

"I think it is a good idea. A lot of young people use the Internet," Fliter said. "That age group historically has the lowest voter turnout. Despite lots of efforts, it

Cats officially accept invitation to Holiday Bowl

■ 10-1 K-State plans trip to San Diego after being overlooked for bid to BCS.

By JOSHUA KINDER
Kansas State Collegian

It's official.

K-State and the Big 12 Conference announced Sunday that K-State had accepted the invitation to participate in the Culligan Holiday Bowl on Dec. 29 in San Diego, Calif.

K-State, after posting a 10-1 overall in the regular season, was not chosen for the second-straight season by the ABC Sports Bowl Championship Series. The team then voted to make the trip to San Diego rather than to Dallas for the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl.

"I think a lot of guys just wanted to go to San Diego, especially because it was something different, and a lot of guys haven't been to California and weren't getting there anytime soon," junior safety Jarrod Cooper said.

Head coach Bill Snyder said Cotton Bowl officials were not able to make a commitment to K-State last week because they were awaiting the outcome of the Big 12 Championship game. Snyder also said K-State went with the Holiday Bowl because it was next in the pecking order of the bowls for the conference, and so that other conference members could get into bowls.

With the distance of Dallas vs. the distance of San Diego in mind, Snyder said he regrets that Wildcat fans might not be able to make the trip to California.

"I feel badly for those fans who this would impact, who would not be able to follow their football team because of the distance and location," Snyder said. "I really do feel badly for them, and our players feel the same way.

"Our fans have been so important to us and followed us tremendously well wherever we have gone, and I feel badly for them. But nevertheless, this is where we are."

The K-State football program and Snyder took a hit Sunday on the ABC Sports "Bowl Selection Show" that when college football studio analyst Terry Bowden said with wins against opponents such as Temple, UTEP and Utah State, K-State won't ever get into a BCS game.

Snyder fired back, saying Bowden is wrong and K-State always has controlled its destiny, no matter what the strength of schedule might be.

"I'll get there quicker than he will," Snyder said of Bowden. "It won't impact what we do here in this foot-

NASA receives no signal from lander in latest attempt

By JOHN ANTCZAK
The Associated Press

PASADENA, Calif. — For a straight third day, NASA's Deep Space Network antennas listened in vain Sunday for a signal from the Mars Polar Lander.

NASA officials said a communications window opened at 12:50 a.m. CST and closed 10 minutes later without any apparent transmission from the surface of the Red Planet.

Mission commentator David Seidel at the Jet Propulsion Laboratory said analysis of the data was continuing, but there appeared not to have been any linkup with the lander.

The lander, if working properly, was supposed to have switched radios to relay a signal through NASA's orbiting Mars Global Surveyor. But the mapping spacecraft only sent its own data and none from the lander.

Sunday's only other communications opportunity, using the original radio, was scheduled for 11:40 p.m. CST to 1:55 a.m. CST.

Lack of any signals since shortly before Friday's scheduled landing left mission officials with hope only that the little craft survived the touchdown and, on its own, was taking steps to establish contact.

Failure of the $165 million Mars Polar Lander would be a double blow to NASA's JPL, still smarting from the September loss of its sibling spacecraft, the Mars Climate Orbiter.

Richard Cook, the spacecraft operations manager, acknowledged late Saturday after a second day of silence that there was less confidence, but he said there were many things that could be tried to get a signal.

The lander was supposed to have signaled immediately after Friday afternoon's touchdown about 500 miles from the Martian south pole.

Two tiny probes designed to fall separately from orbit and plunge into the surface also failed to send signals.

Controllers continued to operate on the assumption that the landing was successful because the spacecraft was in excellent condition just prior to entry and analysis showed its trajectory was good.

Engineers have theorized that the craft set down in a position that has kept its dish antenna from pointing at Earth, or that it settled into a soft surface.

Sunday's first communication window was based on a contingency program carried aboard the lander.

The craft was designed to communicate directly with Earth through a directional dish antenna. But its programing included instruc-

Volleyball team's season comes to halt with loss to Colorado State

By JOSHUA KINDER
Kansas State Collegian

The No. 19 K-State volleyball team's season ended in four games Friday night when it was defeated 12-15, 15-8, 13-15 and 10-15 by No. 11 Colorado State at Moby Arena in Fort Collins, Colo., in the second round of the Mountain Regional of the NCAA Volleyball Tournament.

Despite outkilling and outdigging the Rams (30-2), K-State (21-9) was dominated at the net, being outblocked 22.5 to 8.

The Wildcats opened the first game with a quick 3-0 lead before watching Colorado State go on an 8-0 run to take the lead. K-State closed the lead to within one point on four different occasions but weren't able to regain control as they were beaten 15-12.

Game two was quite different from the first game. The Cats jumped out to a 4-0 lead and never looked back as they won 15-8, never relinquishing the lead.

The Cats used a 9-1 run in game three to overcome an early 4-0 deficit, but unfortunately for K-State, the Rams reeled off seven consecutive points to push the score to 12-9. After coping with yet another Cat comeback that tied the game at 13, Colorado State then finished the game, claiming the last two points for the 15-13 win.

In what was to be the last game of the season for the Cats, the Rams took control, scoring six straight points to break a tie at seven. Despite fighting back with three points of their own to get within four at 14-10, the Cats were finished off at 15-10.

Debate on evolution to take stage with high school play

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — Drama teacher Kevin Kneisley not only expects heated comment about the play Hutchinson High School will stage in February — he's hoping for it.

"Inherit the Wind" dramatizes the 1925 trial in Tennessee of John T. Scopes, charged with violating state law by teaching Darwin's theory of evolution to his high school students.

Scopes was convicted and fined $100.

The play, by Jerome Lawrence and Robert E. Lee, was made into the classic 1960 film of the same name. In the play and the movie, the names of Scopes, prosecutor William Jennings Bryant and defense lawyer Clarence Darrow are changed.

"I have always been concerned by the issues of academic freedom, religious intolerance and intellectual censorship," Kneisley said. "I jumped at the chance to produce this play, which brings to life what truly was the trial of the century."

Rebels turn to guerrilla war as Russia continues attacks

NAZRAN, Russia — As Russia has tightened its circle around Grozny and continued to pummel the Chechen capital with air and artillery attacks, Chechen rebels have turned increasingly to guerrilla tactics, the Russian military said Sunday.

It's a dangerous shift for Russia, which had been hoping to avoid a close-fought war for fear of high casualties among its soldiers.

Because the Russian forces have occupied the greater part of Chechnya, blocking several strategic regions, Chechnya's "illegal armed formations were increasingly using guerrilla methods of warfare," Col. Gennady Alyokhin, a Russian military spokesman, said.

Robyn Reed was crowned Miss Black and Gold at the Kappa Tau chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha's first Miss Black and Gold Pageant.

The pageant, which was Friday evening, is an Alpha Phi Alpha philanthropic event featured at other universities as a way to raise money and help contestants improve their confidence and skills.

"Overall, we believe it was a huge success," said Brandon Clark, sophomore in pre-professional elementary education and president of Alpha Phi Alpha.

"We were really proud of the turnout since it was our first Miss Black and Gold Pageant."

Money was raised through an admissions fee to the pageant and by having the contestants sell advertisements for the program booklet.

Clark said the money raised during the pageant will go toward the Thurgood Marshall Scholarship. Marshall was a U.S. Supreme Court justice and member of Alpha Phi Alpha.

The contestants who competed for the title of Miss Black and Gold were Rebecca Hardy, sophomore in apparel marketing and design; Tramaine Watts, freshman in pre-health professions program; Robyn Reed, junior in economics and social sciences; Megan Smith, freshman in pre-professional elementary education; Latasha Reed, freshman in biology; Felicia Walker, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine; Ashley Hinson, sophomore in pre-health professions program; and Emily Russell, freshman in kinesiology.

The contestants competed in five events — business attire, talent, swimsuit, evening gown and question and answer.

Carlos Etter, junior in management information systems and director and coordinator of the Miss Black and Gold Pageant, said the contestants were interviewed and then chosen by a selection committee.

Several awards were given out at the pageant. Hardy won the awards for Miss Congeniality and Miss Scrapbook; Watts won Miss Sisterhood and Robyn Reed won Miss Talent and Miss Elegance.

The Royalty Court consisted of Latasha Reed, who was crowned Miss Gold; Walker, who was crowned Miss Black; and Robyn Reed, the overall winner.

Clark said Robyn Reed received a $300 scholarship to be used for books and tuition."It was very exciting. It was an honor to represent the Kappa Tau chapter and be an honorary member," Robyn Reed said. "The royal court is responsible for community service, brainstorming some ideas for the brothers to implement."

Clark said Robyn Reed will compete in the regional Miss Black and Gold Competition in March at the Alpha Phi Alpha regional convention in Cincinnati. If she wins there, she will go on to compete at the Miss Black and Gold Competition at the Alpha Phi Alpha national convention in Atlanta.

Etter said the pageant was not just about the contestants looking beautiful, but about helping them build confidence.

"The ladies worked extremely hard. They put in a lot of effort and time in the pageant," Etter said. "Practices lasted three or four hours."

Etter said Alpha Phi Alpha plans to make the pageant an annual event.

"We will have it in the fall," Etter said. "I have had several ladies express interest in the event next year."

Campaign urges citizens to report underage drinking

BY JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new campaign against underage drinking is encouraging people to call and report it, the Kansas Department of Transportation said.

"Alcohol-related crashes for youth under 21 are extensive," Patrice Pomeroy, KDOT assistant bureau chief, said. "When we started this campaign, we assessed how bad the problem was and how to approach it."

The response to the Call/Care initiative has been good, although it is difficult to see whether reports of underaged drinking parties have increased due to the campaign or to a heightened awareness of the problem, Pomeroy said.

"The purpose of the campaign is to show people it's OK to report underage drinking. It prevents alcohol poisoning, drunk driving and other serious problems associated with underage drinking," she said.

The campaign also is being promoted through local police and attention is being directed to counties that are designated problem areas, Pomeroy said.

One focus of the campaign is to inform parents who sponsor parties and provide alcohol to their underage children that their actions are illegal.

"Parents sometimes see underage drinking as a rite of passage or that their children will drink anyway — they might as well sponsor the party," Pomeroy said.

"These parents don't realize they could be charged for providing alcohol to minors. Parents aren't aware of the consequences. There is a zero-tolerance law in Kansas, and any underage person caught drinking and driving could have their license taken away."

The Riley County Police Department is participating in the campaign and has received grant funding in order to publish handouts and reminder magnets for public awareness, said Maj. Larry Woodyard, assistant director for the RCPD.

"We have good public awareness about the problem," Woodyard said. "This campaign, combined with the Little Apple Task Force, MADD groups and others go hand-in-hand."

The response to the campaign in Manhattan is hard to measure, he said.

"This community is pretty responsive. We don't know if they are calling because of the campaign or what, but we get frequent notices of suspected underage drinking. Usually, they are in relation to excessive noise, but we don't poll the callers," Woodyard said.

"This is a good program and there needs to be public awareness," he said. "This is not the absolute and only solution, but it certainly helps."

The Manhattan High School Students Against Destructive Decisions chapter recently won a state award, partly for its work against underage drinking and drunken driving.

"One of their activities was a booth that featured an actual wrecked car that a drunk driver was driving," said Angie Cohorst, coordinator of communications for Manhattan-Odgen USD 383.

Precautions necessary with genetic discovery

We just got one step closer to a world without flaws and disease.

Scientists are getting closer to breaking the human genetic code. Last week, the Human Genome Project announced it had mapped one human chromosome in its entirety. Human genes code everything from eye color to height to certain diseases. A map of our entire DNA will be both a blessing and a hindrance.

This discovery, and ones that are sure to follow, could help end disease by isolating genes that cause certain ailments and plugging in new genes with healthier codes. That's good news.

The bad news is each new discovery brings us closer to a world without flaws, some of which are blessings in disguise. Flaws build character and diversity.

Some of our greatest leaders and historical figures were born with or acquired flaws that might not exist one day. Former U.S. President Franklin D. Roosevelt was in a wheelchair. Ludwig van Beethoven, one of the greatest composers of all time, gradually lost his hearing. Without those flaws, those great leaders and many others might never have achieved greatness.

The benefits of science's new discoveries and those to come are greater than the possible losses. However, every precaution should be taken to ensure that what we lose with this new knowledge are indeed flaws.

Just for the record, as much as I love my Wildcats, every time we play a good team in a bowl game, we get beat. Be careful what you wish for.

I think it's pathetic that people are already calling to get rid of Asbury, especially after our come-from-behind victory over St. Louis. Let's at least wait until we lose our annual 15-20. What do you say?

I just wanted to thank the protesters of the World Trade Organization for their part in helping to make this world a better place.

Why is it that K-State football is upset at the Cotton Bowl and going to the Holiday Bowl this year? They should have just won the Big 12 Championship last year.

I would just like to say how disappointed I am in Bill Snyder.

The Beta Sigs must be really proud. Those nine brothers-to-be shouldn't be in a university setting. They should be in jail.

STRESS relief

Menial tasks, holiday jokes provide needed break from studying for finals

VIEWPOINT

Ken WELLS

OK, now it's crunch time.

We're within spitting distance of year's end. One week of cramming in the final six weeks of the syllabus (instructor: "Oops, my bad, well, I'll just start talking six times as fast!"), one week of final exams, not to mention packing up for the winter, snowproofing your house, defrosting your hamster with a hair dryer and getting your tickets for San Diego.

It's a perfectly full schedule, assuming you don't get sick, or your best friend isn't getting married, or your car doesn't get atomized by Parking Services' new "zero-tolerance molecular disruption" policy or anything else even vaguely unexpected.

Let's face it; these are the times that make deans of student life break down and cry. These are the times when adrenaline is redundant, and you're buying Pepto six-packs and drinking 'em with straws. End Times be damned and Y2K step back, we're one week from finals. Panic when ready. Your seat may be used as a flotation device.

Oh, who am I kidding? You don't need my help to panic. That's what your instructors/advisers/parents are for. You probably could use my help managing stress, but my only clue in dealing with stress is to hit it really hard, generally with something large and metallic. Let's settle for finding that nugget of joy in the last few hair-pulling days of the school year.

Well, you can start doing menial tasks and assure yourself that it's your "last wastepaper basketball game of the century/millenium." The ignore everyone who keeps reminding you that neither the century nor the millennium's over for another year. What do they know? Feh. Spit on anyone who says "year zero" to you.

When carolers come by, give them candy. Have a jack-o'-lantern burning on the porch when they arrive. Be dressed up like a clown. Make sure all of your calendars are turned back to October. When they tell you that it's really December, clutch your chest and fall to the floor in a heap. Watch "Sanford and Son" to practice.

Get food coloring and dye every edible thing in your house red and green. If you have a pet, paint it. Attach blinking lights to every square inch of your house and vehicle. Put tinsel on your backpack. Decorate livestock, especially poultry. Go to Dillons and sing at the top of your lungs. Be warned: people will try to kill you. Laugh at them. Then run.

Or, if you want, pull a 180 and make Scrooge look like a Santa-lackey elf. Put barbed wire in your chimney. Wait with your Super Soaker for carolers. Put small explosive devices in area snowmen and take photos of the aftermath.

Lurk around school-bus stops and whisper to everyone under 9 years old: "Santa's dead. I killed him. His head is in this bowling bag, wanna see?" Pull out a head of cabbage. When they cry, run. (You'll notice you'll have to do a lot of running. Invest in some good boots. Maybe an attorney, too).

Make up your own Christmas carols. Try "I Saw Daddy Kissing Santa Claus" or "The First Down Noel" (It's still football season, after all) or a new take on "The Christmas Song" for the Holiday Bowl: "Huskies roasting on an open fire ..."

Write down an explicit description of the most gruesome bodily process you've ever had or been privy to. Mail it to the Bowl Championship Series.

Refuse to acknowledge that anyone has an actual name. If you must address someone, call them the name of your favorite Pokemon character. Be warned, you'll be needing that attorney if you call the wrong person "Jigglypuff." Or maybe even a doctor.

Do anything you want. Survive. If you weather finals and whatever calamity is being concocted by the pre-2K hysterics, there's a much brighter world on the other side. And a lot more sleep.

Have a good break, everybody. Turn this record over and play Side B.

Poor academic advising plagues many departments at K-State

GUEST VIEWPOINT

SHAUN HUSER

Many students at K-State suffer from a significant handicap that greatly impairs their ability to achieve their academic goals: poor academic advising.

The 1996 report "Interpreting Assessment Reports on Undergraduate Degree Programs at Kansas State University" revealed that student satisfaction of academic advising ranges from 23 percent to 100 percent. Apparently, academic advising is good for students if they are in the right department, but what about those students in departments that only have 23-percent student satisfaction?

I am in the College of Agriculture, which boasts an 80-percent satisfaction rating. That sounds pretty impressive until you realize there are 2,000 students in the College of Agriculture.

The 20 percent of students who are unsatisfied numbers more than 400. Four hundred students dissatisfied with their advisers is a pretty significant number.

I will be the first to admit there are some outstanding advisers within the College of Agriculture, but unfortunately, there are some less-than-desirable advisers within this college.

In spring 1999, I was trying to decide which classes I needed to finish my requirements for a degree in animal science. I wanted to graduate in May 2000. Although I normally pick the classes I want to take before I ever meet with my adviser, I needed help that semester determining what classes I needed to complete my degree requirements. I had a curriculum guide sheet that I was having trouble interpreting, so I asked my adviser to help me follow the guide sheet and make sure I didn't overlook any classes.

I presented my guide sheet to the adviser, and he seemed irritated with the fact that I needed help filling out the sheet. He looked over the empty sheet and told me all I needed to do was pull my head out of my butt and read.

We have to find a way to improve academic advising here at K-State. Although some advisers are doing a fantastic job, others are just slacking off.

I was at a loss for words when he made that comment. So, I ignored it and listened to him explain what classes I needed to take. After the consultation, he sarcastically asked me how long I had been in school. Realizing that he was being a smart-aleck, I remained cool and told him I was a junior. He then said, "I thought you started school yesterday."

I was extremely angry and planned to get another adviser. But I hesitated, given the fact that I had only one more year to complete my degree, and I didn't want the hassle of changing advisers. I think his comments were rude, unprofessional and completely unacceptable — no matter what kind of day he was having.

We have to find a way to improve academic advising here at K-State. Although some advisers are doing a fantastic job, others are just slacking off.

I think the first step to improving academic advising is creating a standardized, universitywide, undergraduate evaluation form to critique academic advisers. They could model the ones used to critique professors and teachers of our classes here at K-State. An evaluation of this kind would enable departments to identify advisers who weren't doing an adequate job.

After identifying those advisers, the departments could implement plans that would lead to better advising quality.

K-State fans should be patient; respect will arrive when earned

Editor,

Much is being made, by the Collegian staff as well as fans everywhere, of the lack of respect shown to the K-State football program as evidenced by its selection to the Culligan Holiday Bowl to play the 7-4 Washington Huskies.

Why can't we play a good team? Why can't we be in a big bowl? Yes, the Wildcats are improved vastly over the 3-8 teams I saw when I was a student 10 years ago. And yes, there are lesser teams going to bigger bowls. But look at K-State's bowl history for a moment.

Three wins, four losses. Did we beat Syracuse in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl? Yes. But how about Purdue, who was also an unheralded underdog at 7-4, in the infamous Remember-The-Alamo Bowl? How about 23-point underdog Boston College in the Aloha Bowl? How about Brigham Young in the Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl? Aside from the Syracuse victory, our other two victories came at the expense of Wyoming and Colorado State. Need I say more?

I am as proud of the accomplishments and improvement of the K-State football program as anyone. But I have seen a lot of college football, and the Wildcats still have work to do.

Bill Snyder has done an incredible job in Manhattan. And with the increased visibility will come more quality recruiting opportunities, as well as more interest from non-conference schedulers at schools other than Northern South Carolina A&M, or Eastern West Virginia Polytech. In the meantime, we the fans must remain realistically patient. We will get the respect we long for — but only after we have earned it.

Reader suggests spending funds from ACLU to pay city, residents

Editor,

I find it ironic that recall committee member Don Rose feels insulted that the American Civil Liberties Union gave $873.31 to the Manhattan Public Library and not back to the city and the taxpayers.

Doesn't he realize that his recall election is going to cost the city $15,000 to $20,000?

I'm insulted that Rose and his fellow recall committee members are spending money anywhere else other than paying back the city and its taxpayers for their small-minded hissy fit.

Fort Riley kicks off holiday season with tree-lighting ceremony

Mike Shepherd/Collegian

Maj. Gen. Freddy McFarren, commander of the 24th Infantry Division (Mechanized) at Fort Riley, smiles at 3-year-old Katy Evers after she switches on the lights to the post's holiday tree Friday afternoon.

By Courtney Duffield
Kansas State Collegian

The little girl stepped forward, chosen from a group of wriggling children.

She walked diligently behind Maj. Gen. Freddy McFarren, intent on her purpose.

Both reached the switch and turned it on, lighting up the Fort Riley Holiday Tree.

Choir music filled everyone's ears as Santa Claus made his appearance Friday on Ware Parade Field.

This was the first year the tree-lighting event at Fort Riley included the Random Acts of Kindness Award Ceremony. Countless acts were taken into consideration, but the winners had participated in the following: visiting hospitals, taking care of children of cancer patients, starting recreation programs, buying uniforms for cheerleaders and other sports teams, starting a summer day camp, teaching Sunday school and doing other tasks, such as raking leaves and mowing lawns.

Chaplain Col. Gregory Schannep welcomed the audience. "This is my third year," he said. "This is without a doubt the best I have seen."

The American flag was raised during a ceremony called the Retreat, and then the Random Act of Kindness winners were announced.

Two from each city were chosen. Leihana Gates and K.C. Goreham were the winners from Junction City; Debbie Smith and Diane Doehling were winners from Manhattan; Glen and Ann Puett were the winners from Ogden, Kan., and Joanne Boyles and Maria Cox were the winners from Fort Riley. "I have met a couple of them and they are well-deserved," Schannep said.

After the winners were announced, McFarren spoke to the audience about the fact that many men and women have fought for America's freedom. He said Fort Riley has many soldiers overseas, away from their families this holiday season.

The choir sang until McFarren announced the arrival of Santa Claus. Closing the ceremony was Matthew Norris, a 7-year-old Fort Riley resident, who sang "O Christmas Tree."

Matthew Norris, 7, sings a solo of "O Christmas Tree" with the Fort Riley Community Choir on Friday night at Fort Riley's Holiday Tree lighting ceremony.

Union to offer free buffet for graduates on Saturday

The K-State Student Union will have a commencement buffet Saturday, offering December graduates a free meal and the opportunity to celebrate with their families.

Cindie Snyder, Union marketing and promotions manager, said the buffet, which takes place each December and May, offers students, families and friends a dining experience that is not only attractive and pleasant, but convenient as well.

"This is an opportunity for families and friends of graduates to come to Manhattan for graduation and not have to worry about making reservations and finding a place to go and eat," Snyder said.

Paul Stolle, director of dining services, said the commencement buffet is a chance for the Union to serve K-State students.

"The K-State Student Union wants to be a part of students' lives," Stolle said.

"This is another service we can offer them while bringing their family into the picture as well."

For the first time, Stolle added, the Union will be offering a free meal to December graduates. While reservations are not required for the buffet, Snyder said students wanting to eat for free must call ahead, and others planning to attend are encouraged to make reservations.

The buffet will run from 10:30 a.m. to 2 p.m. in the Union Ballroom, on the second floor.

The cost is $10.95 for adults and $4.95 for children ages 5-12. Reservations may be made by calling 532-6580 before Thursday.

DEFENSIVE STAND

STORY BY JOSHUA KINDER

Wildcats' 2nd-half defense proves enough to overpower New Orleans Privateers, 62-47

Some say that defense wins championships.

The K-State Wildcats didn't win a championship with their 62-47 victory Saturday over the New Orleans Privateers at Bramlage Coliseum, but the defensive effort did aim K-State in the right direction.

"They go and get three baskets in the second half," head coach Tom Asbury said. "Call it bad shooting or whatever, but I was pleased with our defense. We went through a lot of different guys, and I thought we were able to stay fairly fresh."

Trailing 28-27 at halftime, the Cats (4-1) proceeded to shut down the Privateers (2-3) by holding them to three field goals in the second half. In fact, New Orleans went a little more than 15 minutes without a bucket. In turn, point guard Nathaniel Bailey, the Privateers' leading scorer this season, was held to just 2 points but refused to give K-State's defense any credit.

"I'm not trying to be the leading scorer on the team anymore," Bailey said. "I'm trying to take the role of a point guard and take less shots. It wasn't anything they were doing, it was what I was doing. I was holding back from shooting and holding back from creating.

"I don't feel like they did anything on defense to keep me from scoring. I felt I did more to stop me than they did."

Offensively K-State had another improved game in terms of turnovers. The Wildcats averaged nearly 27 turnovers a game until last week's last-second triumph over St. Louis, when they committed 16. Against the Privateers, they bettered their previous performance by turning the ball over just 13 times.

"We get 13, and they get 25," Asbury said of the turnovers. "That's gotten a little better in the last two games, obviously, and that leaves you a chance to play a little better."

The return of sophomore point guard Josh Kimm has helped to decrease K-State's turnovers. For the first two games of the season, Kimm was sidelined because of a knee injury. Junior newcomer Galen Morrison and freshman Kenyatta Dix filled in, helped by senior Cortez Groves. None of them is a prototypical point guard, which led to more turnovers.

Against the Privateers, Kimm scored two points and had three assists in a career-high 33 minutes. It also was his second career start.

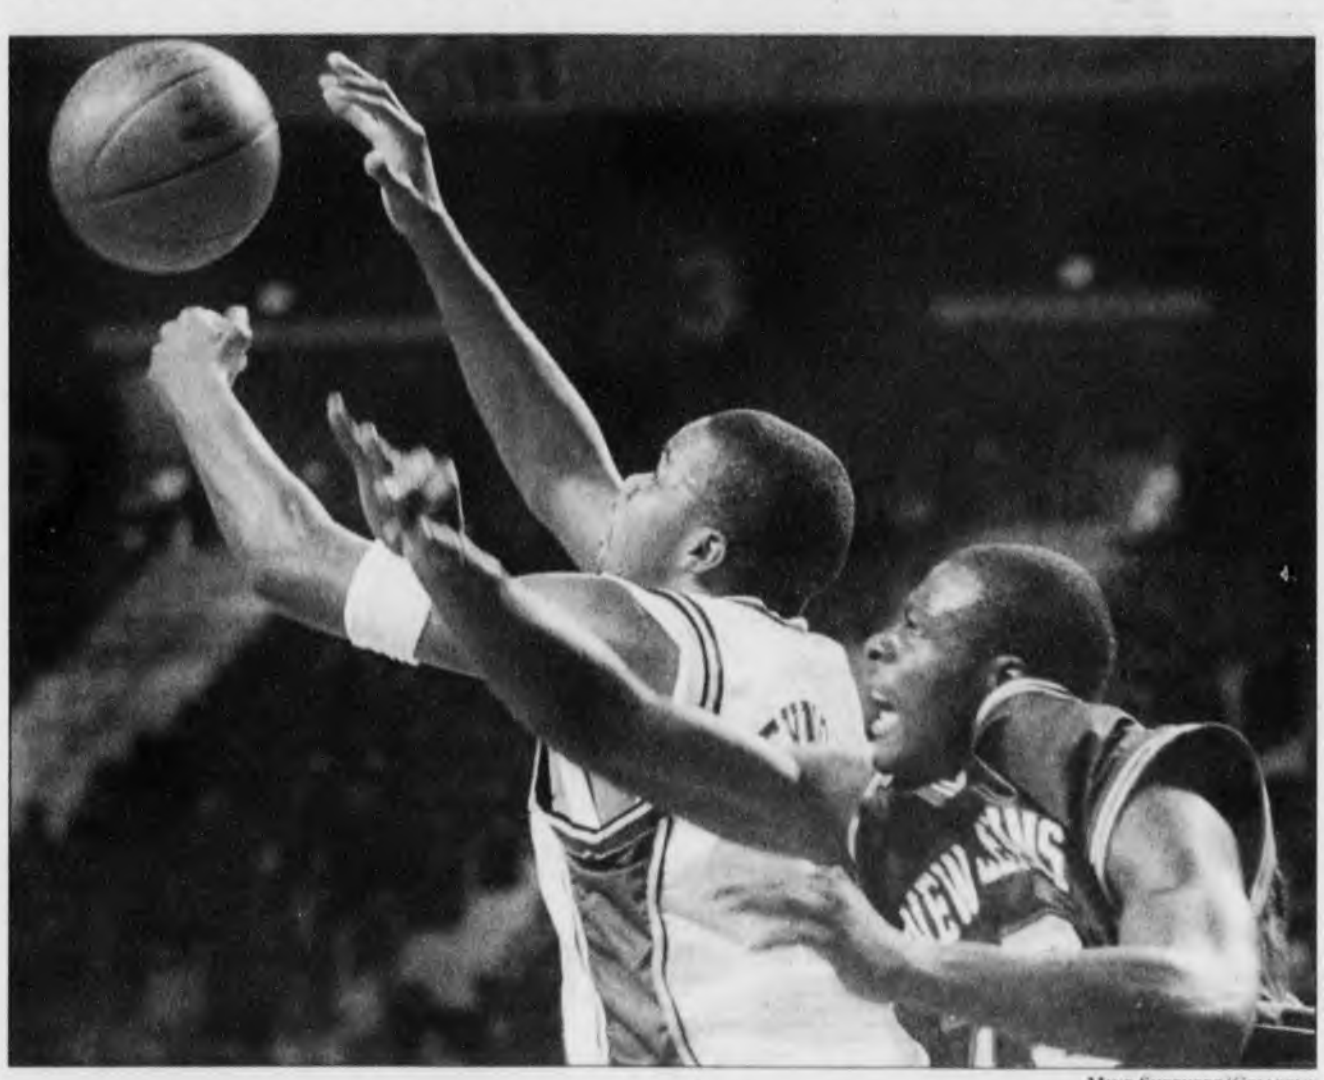
"He handles the ball extremely well," senior forward Josh Reid said of Kimm. "He's so strong and hard to steal the ball from.

"Kimm has been playing pretty solid, and I think as long he keeps playing like that in the game, it's going to be his position to keep until somebody steps up and takes it from him."

Asbury attributed the fewer turnovers to better decisions.

"I think it's better decisions," he said. "To be honest, Josh Kimm has a solid knowledge of our offense, and we are not getting the turnovers from the point. We're getting better."

K-State didn't fare as well as far as its field-goal shooting. For the game, the Cats shot a dismal 37.3 percent from the field.



In fact, the combined field-goal percentage for both teams was 30, the lowest at home in K-State history.

The first half of the game was nothing more than a seesaw battle. Neither team was in control of the game, with New Orleans posting the largest lead of the first half at 21-15.

K-State scored first in the second half and exchanged baskets with the Privateers before the Cats went on an 11-0 run, which lasted until the 12:43 mark, when New Orleans sank the first of 11 free throws in the half.

K-State was paced by Groves' 14 points and senior forward Tony Kitt's 13.

The Cats return to action Wednesday when they play host to Memphis at 7 p.m. in Bramlage.

MIKE SHEPHERD/COLLEGIAN

K-State's Travis Reynolds (left) battles New Orleans' Clyde Ellis for a rebound in the first half Saturday. K-State won the game, 62-47.

Early-season performances reveal positive signs for Wildcats

Maybe they won't be that bad.

Finally, after one blowout, one comeback and two narrow-margin victories, the K-State men's basketball team finally has shown signs of coming together as a team.

"We have seen a lot of improvements in our guys, and we are starting to gel as a team," senior forward Josh Reid said.

Well, maybe "coming together" is a loose term. The Wildcats are more like a finely tuned engine, without the finely tuned part.

Nevertheless, after their 62-47 domination of New Orleans, the Wildcats look as if their season might not shape up to be as bad as all the preseason magazines predicted.

In fact, if you look at how far the Wildcats have gone in just five games, it wouldn't be a huge stretch to think that they might be able to make some sort of run in March.

Now, don't throw your paper down in disgust just yet. Bear with me and take a look at the statistics.

In K-State's season opener against Arizona in the Preseason National Invitation Tournament, the Wildcats looked like an intramural team, coughing up 23 turnovers and getting outrebounded by a bigger, faster and deeper Arizona team.

Sloppy play by guards Galen Morrison and Cortez Groves helped Arizona grab 12 steals en route to an 88-69 smashing of the Purple People on ESPN2. Ouch.

Still, the Wildcats didn't wither and die as they began a five-game homestand with Northwestern (La.) State. Although the 76-71 squeaker against Northwestern State was far from impressive, it set up a series of improvements that could give the Wildcats momentum to beat Memphis on Wednesday.

In each of its next five games, K-State improved in a different category.

Against Northwestern State, the improvement was depth. Four Wildcats scored in double figures. Much needed community-college transfers Morrison and Kelvin Howell had solid games.

K-State then beat Texas-San Antonio, 86-75. Against the Roadrunners, the Wildcats improved their shooting. The Cats shot 50 percent from the floor, a season high. Unfortunately, K-State's turnover problem, which had plagued the Wildcats in their first three games when they averaged 26 a game, was at its worst.

K-State coughed up the ball a season-high 27 times.

K-State then knocked off St. Louis in an emotional 69-68 victory. The Wildcats improved drastically, turning the ball over just 16 times and came back from a 12-point halftime deficit.

Head coach Tom Asbury said K-State's better decision-making has resulted in fewer turnovers.

"I think it's better decisions," he said. "To be honest, Josh Kimm has a solid knowledge of our offense, and we are not getting the turnovers from the point. We're getting better."

Against the New Orleans Privateers, K-State's improvements culminated in a solid effort and helped the Wildcats finally mesh as a basketball team. Although it shot just 37 percent from the floor, K-State cut its turnovers to a season-low 13 and played its best defense yet.

The Wildcats forced 25 turnovers, and the Privateers shot a measly 32.4 percent from the floor.

"That says a lot for our defense," Reid said. "Our defense is getting better by leaps and bounds right now, and we come out and continue to improve every day."

K-State is getting better, lots better. Don't get me wrong, it's far from being a top-15 team and still might struggle against powerhouses Kansas and Texas, but don't scratch the Wildcats off your NCAA Tournament list just yet.

If K-State can continue the kind of improvement it has made in the first five games, imagine how much it will improve in February and March.

"Over the last week, we have made a lot of progress in the last couple of games," forward Tony Kitt said. "Guys are starting to accept their roles, and guys are starting to know what they can do in the offense. For the most part, it was the new guys used to a game rhythm and game-type situations."

Don't make NCAA Tournament ticket arrangements right now, but don't count K-State out. The Wildcats have all that it takes to be successful: a good attitude, a never-say-die belief and the willingness to improve.

Even if the Cats don't achieve Big 12 Championship trophies or post-season berths, they still might be able to keep K-State fans' minds off football for a while.

Poor offense saved by defensive effort

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State shot 37 percent from the field against New Orleans — and won by 15 points. It just goes to show how defense can win ballgames.

"I know K-State is known for defense," Wildcats sophomore forward Travis Reynolds said. "Every year they have a very good defensive team, and this year we can't think anything different. We've just got to go out and play hard and do the things on defense to help the team win."

After trailing at halftime, 28-27, to the Privateers, the defense allowed 19 second-half points and 18.8 percent shooting from the field en route to a 62-47 victory.

"We basically went out and got it done," senior forward Tony Kitt said. "We talk about it all the time, and it was like, stop talking and go out and play."

The Wildcats held the Privateers without a field goal from the 18:04 mark of the second half until 2:58 remained.

"I've never seen a game, any time or anyplace, where someone has held another team without a field goal for 15 minutes," head coach Tom Asbury said.

New Orleans was limited to a Bramlage Coliseum-low 11 field goals in the game.

"It was the same problem we've had all year," New Orleans head coach Joey Stiebing said. "We just turned the ball over too much, and that was carelessness on our part."

K-State forced 25 Privateers turnovers in the game, helping the Wildcat defense create the offense.

"We knew they'd slow it down and take good shots," Wildcats junior center Joe Leonard said. "We knew we had to step up and play good defense."

The Wildcats held New Orleans' leading scorer, junior guard Nathaniel Bailey, to two points in the game, 11 fewer than his season average.

"It was huge," K-State senior forward Josh Reid said. "He's a guy that can just go off on you all of a sudden. Especially with a team like that where they're so patient, they need a guy like that. Our point guards did a great job on him."

Asbury said he was pleased with his club's overall defensive performance against the Privateers.

"Obviously, I think we really got out and did a lot of good things defensively — didn't give them a lot of really good looks at it," Asbury said. "And I'd say that's kind of reminiscent of what we've hung our hat on around here defensively."

K-State has led the Big 12 Conference in field-goal percentage defense in conference games in each of its three seasons, as well as the final season of the Big 8 Conference. In 1998-99, the Wildcats led the nation by holding opponents to just 37.1 percent shooting from the field.

"I think last year, Shawn (Rhodes) and Manny (Dies) knew their roles," Kitt said. "And it's just a matter of everybody doing what it takes — doing their job, and I think everything will fall into place."

The K-State women's basketball team swept the Wildcat Classic opposition with wins over Alabama State and Idaho, moving its record to 4-2, with tournament MVP Angie Finkes leading the Cats in scoring both nights.

Friday night, with 8:12 remaining in the 80-32 win over the ASU Hornets, Finkes got her 1,000th career point, joining just 23 other Wildcats in that honor. She also grabbed a double-double with her 19 points and 12 rebounds.

"It's something I think everybody tries to accomplish so I'm very proud of it, but I'm more just happy we won," Finkes said. "I think it just goes to show what a great coaching staff we have that helped me learn a lot of the moves, and the intensity and how to play at this level.

"And the other teammates, because if I didn't have the other teammates I couldn't score, because I can't dribble."

The Cats held the Hornets to just 14 points at halftime — a tournament low — and just 16.7-percent shooting from the floor, holding them to a shutout on three-point attempts, missing 10.

"I thought our defense was very good tonight," Coach Deb Patterson said. "On the same hand, I thought Alabama State had difficulty finishing because they're young and not quite polished. I think their struggles on the offense were twofold. Defensively, I think we challenged almost every shot they took and that's a positive."

The Cats fought a little more for the championship win against the Idaho Vandals. Down five points at halftime, the Cats came back, spurred by four of five three-point shooting from sophomore Kristin Rethman and a halftime decision not to lose the game.

"We stepped up at the second half and didn't want to lose the game," Finkes said. "Pretty much it was just up to us deciding to play better basketball, so I think everybody made a decision in their minds to do that."

Junior point guard April Sailors, who has struggled in recent games to hit the three, knocked down three of four in the final game.

"Things are coming together more and more each game," Sailors said. "I'm trying to get my players more involved, and things are falling into place a little more each game. I've been working on my shot a little bit and I'm feeling more confident — that way if just like tonight with the guards clamping down on our posts they'll be able to kick it out and I can hit some big shots."

The Cats played several minutes of zone in both tourney games, but were not happy with their defense against Idaho.

"I thought they were very intelligent in the way they tried to attack us," Patterson said. "On our end, we did not defend middle penetration tonight and that just caused a multitude of problems defensively. We had layup after layup in situations where middle penetration broke down our defense, posts stepped up to help and they'd get an easy dish for the layup or a nice little kick out for the 6- or 7-footer."

Patterson said the zone defense will factor into road games later in the season.

The Cats take the court again Wednesday at Wisconsin-Green Bay.

Idaho's Darci Pemberton loses the ball to K-State's Nicky Ramage in the second half of Saturday night's championship game of the Wildcat Classic. The Wildcats won the game 81-69, improving their record to 4-2.

ska shocked

Silverado Saloon to offer ska music for 1st time, local musicians to mix sounds with national act

story by Nancy Foster

ancing bodies, booming bass and blaring trombones must mean only one thing.

Ska music.

At 9:30 p.m. on Dec. 7, the Silverado Saloon will be the site of a ska concert for the first time in its history. The event, Ska Night, will feature three different bands: local groups Shocks of Mighty and Ruskabank and national act Warsaw.

Jeff Fellows, concert promoter for Silverado, described ska as fun music with a horn section and a happy bass.

"It's got the energy of rock 'n' roll, but it's a little more dance-oriented," Dave Spiker, lead singer of Ruskabank, said.

Fellows said Ruskabank play regular ska music, while Shocks of Mighty is more of a reggae-ska, and Warsaw has more of a ska-punk angle.

Spiker described his band's sound as 50s-style ska.

"We have a mixture of a horn section and keyboard," Spiker said.

Both Shocks of Mighty and Ruskabank are Manhattan acts, while Warsaw is from Arizona. Warsaw has played with multiple national acts, including bands such as the Mighty Mighty Bosstones.

"We get the opportunity to hear bands that have played with national acts because they are passing through town," Fellows said. "A lot of places don't have Tuesday-night concerts. If we only did concerts on Thursdays and Fridays, these bands would be really expensive."

The first act, Shocks of Mighty, will take the stage at 9 p.m., then Ruskabank at 10:30 p.m., and at midnight, Warsaw will bring the night of ska to an end.

"I think it's really neat that local bands are getting the chance to play with national acts," Fellows said. "If national acts like them, they'll pick them up. It opens doors for local acts to get into the main circuit."

He said this was the case with the local band Pomeroy, which now has now had the opportunity to play with various national acts.

Streetside Records and On the Wildside both have coupons that reduces the event's $5 ticket price to $4. Campus radio station KSDB-FM 91.9, which is sponsoring the show, will give away tickets.

"It's a great way to support the local radio show and local bands," Fellows said.

Fellows said the station will have the bands on its local show at 7 p.m. before they go to Silverado.

Spiker said local music has always been in Manhattan, but that local drinking establishments are just beginning to pay more attention to it.

"It's always been here, but businesses are putting more of an emphasis on it," Spiker said. "Alcohol comes first in Aggieville, and then whatever comes next, but bands are now becoming more of an importance in the bars."

Fellows said it should be a fun show because of the way Silverado is arranged.

"It's a neat set-up. The bands are set up high so that everyone can see them, and there is a big dance floor, so, if people want to dance, they can because there's enough room," Fellows said.

Ska Night is an 18-and-over show, with no extra charge for those younger the age of 21. Spiker said those younger than 21 really should take advantage of there are few show because the opportunities to attend concerts like these.

"It'll be a very excellent show with some very excellent bands," Fellows said.

Cross-dressing humor featured in arts center production

■ 'A Tuna Christmas' divides 22 characters between 2 men portrayed in holiday comedy.

BY DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Charles Faulk and Rich Richards wear tight gold pants, panty hose and dresses in public, but only for a limited time. You can see them in their unusual attire at the Manhattan Arts Center's production "A Tuna Christmas."

The play finds humor in the everyday lives of 22 citizens of Tuna, Texas.

Faulk and Richards are the only cast members and portray all 22 characters.

Local theatergoers might remember the pair and some of the show's characters from the 1995 Columbian Theatre's production of "Greater Tuna." "A Tuna Christmas" is its sequel.

Cherie Geiser, producer of the play and associate professor of Intralibrary services, said they all are characters audiences will want to meet, but she has her favorites.

"I remember Dee Dee Snavely. She's the owner of the gun shop in Tuna. She always smokes cigarettes, wears camouflage and decorates her Christmas tree with hand grenades," Geiser said.

Faulk and Richards have their favorites, too.

"I think one of my favorite characters to play is a rich lady called Vera Carp. She sort of fancies herself to be high society, and she sort of holds it over everyone's head," Faulk said. "And I get to wear a huge chiffon dress. She's really funny."

Richards said he likes Aunt Pearl, his favorite character, for different reasons.

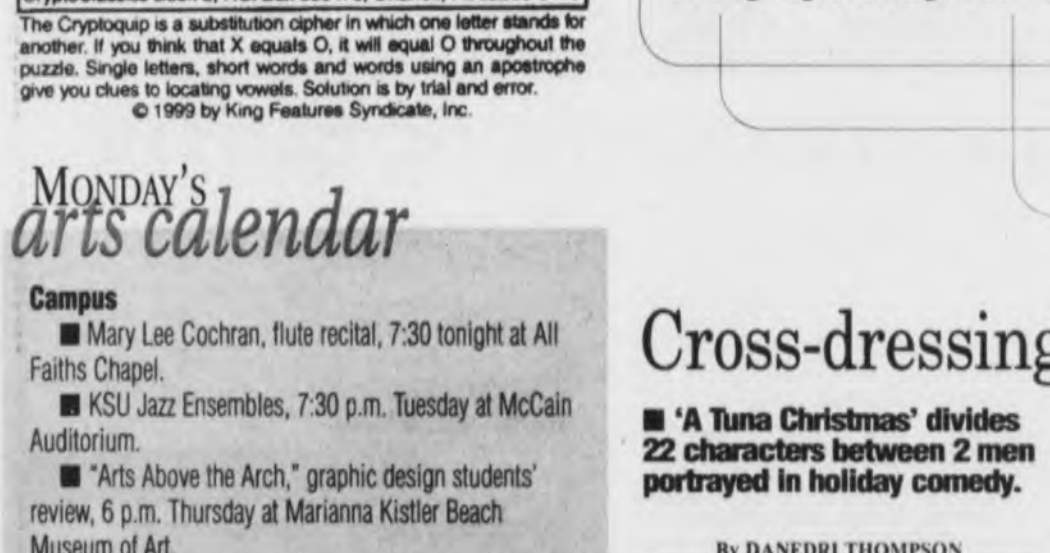
"She is a local chicken rancher," he said. "And I like her because she is bizarre."

Geiser said that because the characters were so colorful in "Greater Tuna," the arts center is expecting a lot of people who saw the first show to see this one.

"It's almost becoming a camp," she said. "There is a real following of people who are 'Tuna' fans. They're almost like Trekkies are 'Star Trek' fans."

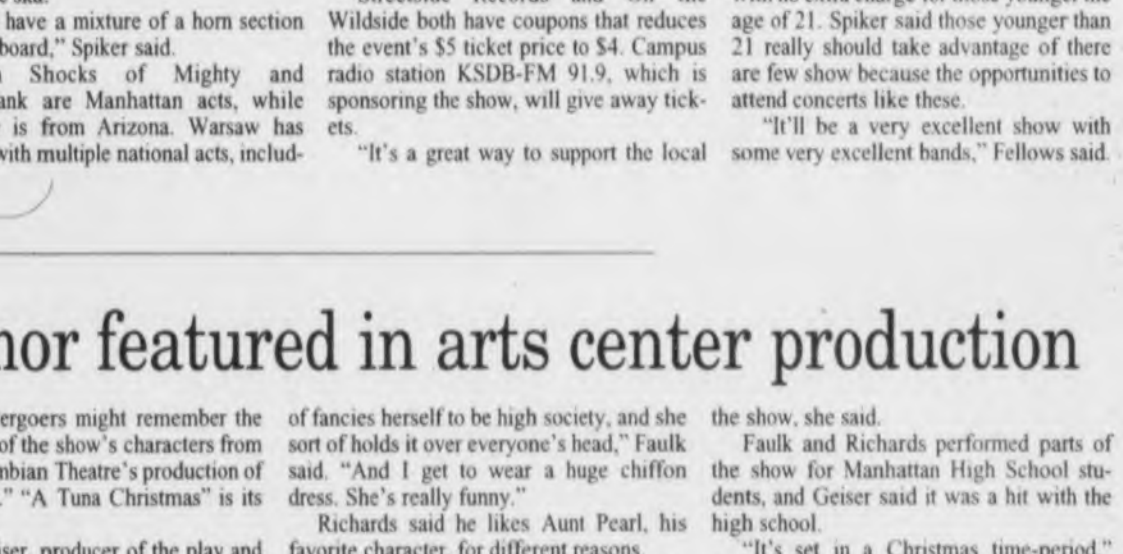
However, audiences who missed the first helping of Tuna in 1995 still will understand the show, she said.

Faulk and Richards performed parts of the show for Manhattan High School students, and Geiser said it was a hit with the high school.



"It's set in a Christmas time-period," Geiser said. "But there's nothing serious about it. It's even just comic to look at them, because one is this 6-foot-2 guy and the other is this short, little guy.

"In one scene you have this tiny, little guy — Elmer — falling in love with Bertha, the big guy," she said. "It's a hilarious comedy."



Richards said he agreed.

"It's funnier than hell. It's a hoot," he said. "If this doesn't get you in the Christmas spirit, I don't know what will."

Castro demands Cuban boy be returned within 72 hours

BY ANITA SNOW
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HAVANA — Cuban President Fidel Castro demanded Sunday the United States return a boy rescued at sea to his father in Cuba within 72 hours, warning the Cuban people were losing patience and soon would begin demonstrations.

"There will be millions of people in the streets demanding the boy's freedom," Castro said, according to state radio and television. "It is difficult to hold back the population with the state of irritation" generated by the case of 5-year-old Elian Gonzalez.

Castro accused the U.S. of kidnapping Elian, who was found clinging to an inner tube floating off the coast of Florida. He promised a "battle for world opinion" to bring the child home.

In an unusual move Sunday, the Cuban government stationed several dozen soldiers outside the U.S. Interests Section in Havana — the American government's Cuban mission.

The reason for the move was not clear; generally there are only about four soldiers outside the mission. Calls requesting comment from the mission were referred to Washington.

State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said last week Cuba asked the U.S. mission in Havana on Nov. 27 for the child's return. But the case was referred to the Florida state courts because they take precedence in custody disputes, he said.

Greeting the Cuban delegation at the airport upon their return from the World Trade Organization meeting in Seattle, Castro blamed the U.S. government for the boating accident that killed Elian's mother and 10 others.

The overloaded powerboat they had been traveling in sank during the 90-mile crossing to Florida. The boy was found Nov. 25 just off Fort Lauderdale. The U.S. Coast Guard described the incident as a case of illegal alien smuggling.

"The United States is the only one responsible for the tragedies produced by illegal departures," Castro said of the accident.

Elian's father, Juan Miguel Gonzalez, 31, said his ex-wife took his son out of Cuba without his knowledge. Castro said the child's stepfather, who also died in the accident, organized the smuggling operation.

Elian's father and four grandparents have asked Cuba's Foreign Ministry for help in getting the boy back. The U.S. government has released the boy to his great-aunt and great-uncle in Miami.

American officials said a Florida state court should decide whether Elian should be raised in the United States or returned to his father and grandparents in Cuba. But Cuban authorities rejected this, saying they did not trust the "corrupt judges" in a state where anti-Castro exiles hold political sway.

Residents celebrate completion of renovations to Goodnow Hall

BY TRACY DOILE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Goodnow Hall's name describes the condition of its first-floor lobby.

Renovations as part of an ongoing residence hall project recently were completed, and the ribbon-cutting ceremony was Friday.

The renovations to Goodnow took place during the summer, and the ceremony was organized to recognize the workers' dedication.

Chuck Werring, director of Housing and Dining Services, and Skyler Harper, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services and facilities management, were featured speakers at the ceremony.

"I'm very proud of where we've come," Werring said.

Werring said he attended K-State in the 1970s, and the residence halls hadn't changed much between then and when he took his position with Housing and Dining Services in 1990.

Evelyn West, Housing and Dining Services employee who works on the fifth and sixth floors of Goodnow, said the change came at a good time.

"It was time for a change, and it makes the students feel they're in a more comfortable living environment," West said. "It was time to modernize."

Some of the most popular features of the renovations to the lobby are the e-mail terminals.

"It's a good place to socialize and check your e-mail," said Paul Ditmer, junior in elementary education and first-floor resident assistant.

Harper commented on the success of the Internet access in the lobby.

"The e-mail stations seem to be very popular," he said.

Harper said the computer stations are distinctive to Goodnow.

"We try to build on every lobby that we do and try new things, too," he said. "We try to give each hall its own feel. We make a conscious effort to make each different."

Other notable renovations include a skylight porch room that increased the lobby's size. New carpet was installed, and the old furniture was replaced.

Besides making the lobby look nicer, Harper said the renovations make it more functional, too. He commended the skilled craftsman who were able to build a convenient extra-key cabinet.

Jennifer Olivigni, sophomore in biology and Hall Governing Board member, said the front lobby's desk now is better equipped for the community assistants and others who work there.

"The desk is really nice, and it's more organized," she said. "It makes the CAs' job easier."

Harper said the renovations address many American Disabilities Act issues.

Werring said the project included the combined efforts of students, construction crews, design groups, and building operations and maintenance workers. All played significant roles in the renovations.

Harper said nearly all the work that took place was done entirely by K-State facilities. He said only a portion of the stonework was contracted to be done by workers outside of his department.

"The lobby looks fantastic," Olivigni said. "The renovations give it a more modern look, and they livened up the living atmosphere."

Parking Services will be in the Student Union Ballroom on January 11th and 12th from 8:00 a.m. until 4:30 p.m. Permits will be sold for spring and summer semesters.
